"People have such a love of candy," she says. "You don't just want kids having candy all the time, so when you bring them to a special affair and they see the overwhelming amount of candy, it's so exciting for them."

It's even more exciting for the parents that Schwartz provides kosher candy, because, as Firestone says, kosher is still the way to go. "Having a kosher function is important to people. If you belong to a synagogue, you're going to have a kosher function. A lot of people wouldn't come if you're not offering a kosher meal."

With more non-traditional venues offering kosher options, you could have a life event almost anywhere, but Firestone says having a function at a synagogue can actually save you money. "Everything is there," she says. "When you go to an offsite venue, you're dealing with rentals and that can get costly. Tables, chairs, dishes, all this things are available at the synagogue."

Firestone's new venue can accommodate up to 400 people in one room, or the place can be sectioned off into five rooms for more intimate gatherings. The Adath Israel's new caterer says she already has a lot of weddings booked for 2007. "Our clients are moving with us."

Sweet York is always committed to quality foods.

Schwartz, though, is just starting to take bookings, so her calendar is ready to be filled. "Our first booking is in February," she says, "but we could start tomorrow if they start calling us."

Besides new beginnings, Firestone and Schwartz have another thing in common. They're both in the catering business to make people happy. "I love working with people," says Schwartz. "Seeing the kids' faces when they see the candy, now that's excitement."

Florists add the final touch to your party

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Flowers are to special events what frames are to precious works of art.

Acting as the final beautifying agent, flowers complete the beautiful picture of your already beautiful event.

Flowers have the ability to transform your event into a secret garden, a tropical rainforest or even a Zen palace, so their importance should never be underestimated. Similarly, finding the perfect florist should not be underestimated either.

Dizennio Floral Boutique (905-303-6656, 9222 Keele St, www.dizenniofloral.com) specializes in full service floral décor for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs and corporate events. All well as handling major events, Dizennio creates unique bouquet arrangements and fruit baskets for everyday use.

Designing an event to complement the colours and style of the venue is key to its elegance. [Bliss Photography for Greenleaves and Petals Ltd.]

Designing unique arrangements to match the tone of each event, Dizennio creates floral creations that are known to leave such a lasting impression on guests that the Dizennio's reputation grows exponentially with each event.

"We truly wow people," says owner Rosanne Farano.

Importing only the finest quality flowers from around the world, Dizennio impresses clients with creativity and quality, she says.

Dizennio can also create magic with every budget.

"The amount of flowers has nothing to do with the beauty of the event," Farano says. "Often, less is more".

With its stunning showroom space readily available to you, you can touch and see the flowers you are choosing to work with. Dizennio will then co-ordinate the look of the event with you.

"We pay attention to every tiny detail," Farano says.

Once you have an idea of what you want, Dizennio's staff will set up the showroom to resemble your event, so that you can see for yourself how things will look.

Another fantastic florist in the Toronto area is Greenleaves And Petals (905-709-4080, 7073 Yonge St., www.greenleavesandpetals.com). Operating as a full-service flower shop, Greenleaves also specializes in creating lavish floral arrangements for simchahs and corporate events.

Since 1983, Greenleaves has been known for its full-service attitude. Customizing every aspect of your event from centerpieces to chupahs to backdrops, Greenleaves can truly do anything.

To make holding your event as simple as can be, Greenleaves will even take care of event planning details for you.

"We are so much more than a flower shop," says owner Elaine Birnbaum. "We offer complete co-ordinating as well."

Greenleaves will scout the venue and create a prototype of the designs at the venue for you to preview. Co-ordinating consultations on your behalf, Birnbaum will meet with caterers and venue managers to ensure that the planning is cohesive.

Birnbaum will take away the stress of remembering the nitty-gritty details and worry about them for you. While you sit back and relax, Birnbaum and her associates will get to work, planning the event of your dreams.

And you thought Greenleaves was just a flower shop.

"I love working with so many different people on such a regular basis," says Birnbaum. "It's so gratifying to see the look on my clients faces when they see what we've done".

Anniversary gift ideas: match milestones with meaningful items

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements Co-ordinator

In 1922, etiquette guru Emily Post compiled a wedding anniversary gift list that remains popular today. Here is her list with some traditional and some modern gift suggestions.

Although environmentalists and electronics publishers now envision a paperless world, paper is still a prevalent commodity. The first anniversary is the paper anniversary, and it is therefore appropriate to convey your good wishes to couples celebrating that anniversary by giving greeting cards and cheques.

Cotton is as sought after in the new millennium, as it was in the Post era. The fabric is used in manufacturing numerous items of clothing and furnishings. It thus provides a practical base from which to choose a gift for a couple's second wedding anniversary.

Leather-bound books, furniture and equipment add a warm look to a home. So, if it's the third anniversary of a special couple, think leather when you're out shopping for a memento of the occasion.

Fruit and flowers are nature's way of saying all is right with the world. Make the fourth anniversary a festive one by bringing home a fruit basket or a floral centrepiece.

The consumer will find it easy to shop for couples celebrating their fifth wedding anniversary, since so many articles are constructed from wood.

Tin and aluminum are symbolic components in gifts for couples celebrating their 10th wedding anniversary. Whether it's a traditional bicycle built for two or a modern mountain bike, the idea is to encourage the couple to take advantage of quality time together.

Crystal is delicate and deserves proper care. However, by the time the couple celebrate their 15th wedding anniversary, they are accustomed to keeping house and used to entertaining. Present them with a set of stemware and everyone will have an opportunity to clink glasses and wish them a long and happy life.

China is beautiful to behold and stays in style. Besides, by the time a couple reaches their 20th anniversary, their family has grown and they have more simchahs to host. Everything from a tea service to dinnerware and ornaments can embellish a home. Chinaware also creates a classy ambience for recipients and house guests.

Articles made of silver abound in gift stores, and they make dazzling 25th anniversary gifts. The esthetic and functional components of sterling and silver plate are manifold. Flatware, serving pieces and ceremonial objects such as kiddish cups, candlesticks and menorahs serve as significant gifts for the home. Jewelry items for her and him are also wise choices.

Pearls are precious 30th wedding anniversary gifts. Whether the pearls are fashioned as jewelry items or furnishings, the recipients will appreciate the elegant gesture.

By 40 years, the family has multiplied and grandchildren often appear on the scene. If a mate or child can afford the real thing – a ruby ring, bracelet, brooch, neck piece or cufflinks, that is something special. However, ruby red roses and ruby red wine are also meaningful gifts.

For some, gold is synonymous with gelt. Nevertheless, furnishings, dinnerware and jewelry are also decorated with gold. In Emily Post's era, not many couples lived to celebrate their 50th wedding anniversary. Today, many active seniors are happily celebrating that milestone.

Even fewer couples celebrated 60th wedding anniversaries before 1950, but now it's not unusual to come across numerous names in mazel tov columns. By this stage, the couple may have great-grandchildren. Diamond-studded gift items and jewelry come in all shapes, sizes and forms. If the real thing is out of reach, there is always the diamond-themed party or symbolic presentation.

International style brought straight to you

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Looking like an international jetsetter isn't as hard as you may think. We may dream of scouring the world for beautiful pieces, but most of us rarely do. Thankfully, there are people to do it for us now.

At least two retailers in Toronto can help you find clothing and accessories that will make you look as though you just stepped off a plane from Milan.

Fashions from around the world

Trendy Accessories (494 Lawrence Ave. W., 416-783-4909) offers an eclectic mix of Canadian and imported lines from all over Europe. From its early stages as a tiny store 14 years ago, Trendy Accessories has grown into a boutique that sells a variety of accessories, from purses to hats to jewelry.

Co-owned by Aggie Lazlo and Judy Revai, the store has steadily built up a reputation that seems to be growing by the minute. And with prices starting as low as $20, it's no wonder people are discovering the wonderful merchandise available.

Trendy Accessories is about creating a special look to fit every customer. By spending time with everyone who comes into the store, the staff will guide you through the most suitable pieces for your individual style.

This season, Lazlo says, a layered and textured look is the most popular trend. As seen on many Hollywood starlets, including Keira Knightly and Sienna Miller, you can achieve the look of the season by wrapping one or more shawls around chunky necklaces.

One of the most innovative lines in the store is the Dutch line, Sandwich, which offers several beautiful mix and match pieces, Lazlo says. And, since the store carries only a few of each piece, you can be sure that no one will have a look exactly like yours – at least on this side of the Atlantic.

Once you've got all your favourite accessories, you'll need a perfect dress to wear them with! And what better place to go than St. Honoré (808 York Mills Rd., 416-449-2672).

Travelling across the world to hand select the outfits in the store, owners Sam and Zari Benaich carry only the best in European and American designer labels. Lines include such world-renowned names as Victor & Delano, Luisa Cerano and Teenflo, and each outfit is limited in supply to ensure that you have a one-of-a-kind look.

The clothing at St. Honoré is for any woman who wants to feel spectacular while partying at a special event. From party dresses to dress suits, the clothing is guaranteed to be of the highest quality while keeping up with the hottest trends. The warm yet stylish interior makes it a pleasure just to peruse the garments in the store. And with a true understanding of fit, style and cut, the staff at St. Honoré will take care of you from head to toe.

On the special occasions that mark your year, it's always important to feel like a star. With the help of style conscious boutiques like St. Honoré and Trendy Accessories, you won't have so much trouble. While keeping their ear to the ground so that they can bring you the latest styles, they also maintain a high quality to ensure your pieces last as long as you need them. No one has to know that you weren't sipping wine in the south of France…

Value and amazing food at the Pickle Barrel

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Peter Higley, president of the Pickle Barrel, says you don't have to break the bank to have an elegant, stylish party.

He says the company's new banquet hall (416-990-5086) at McCowan Road and Highway 7 (5700 Highway 7) is affordable and well-appointed. "When people see the place, they say, 'Wow! I can't believe this is the Pickle Barrel.'

"It's hard to beat our price. It's one of the best deals around."

He notes that all the bar and bat mitzvah packages include DJ service from the Magen Boys. "All the kids love them. They all want the Magen Boys."

Located in the Markville Shopping Centre, the two-year-old banquet hall was recently named the Harold Soupcoff Room, in memory of the popular late co-founder of the Pickle Barrel, says Higley, "He was a great guy and a real philanthropist in the Jewish community."

Higley stresses that the new hall is large – it's on the former site of a Walmart store – and has its own entrance with a large foyer so "people don't have to parade through the restaurant."

He says that the room holds 150 to 180 people comfortably, with room for a DJ and dance floor, adding that the space can accommodate up to 210 people for corporate events.

Sheryl Ross, banquet manager and events co-ordinator, says she's on site for every party at the Harold Soupcoff Room. "I'm pretty much at every event. We're a very hands-on company."

Ross outlined some of the bar/bat mitzvah and wedding packages offered at the Markville location, which all require a minimum of 75 people. The $4,950 bar/bat mitzvah package is for 75 people, with a cost of $29.99 (plus tax and gratuities) per person for additional people.

"This amount [$4,950] covers all gratuities, the event co-ordinator, DJ and MC services, a custom-designed poster, sign-in board, invitations, linen, balloons, décor centrepieces, an oversized celebration cake, a buffet or three-course à la carte service dinner, sweet table and unlimited pop, coffee and tea."

The second package, which begins at $6,499.99 for 75 people, with each additional guest costing $35.99 (plus tax and gratuities), is the same basic package as the first with the following additions: one dancer, specialty linens, chair covers, 360 novelty giveaway items, an extra dinner course, hot hors d'oeuvres, a premium sweet table with a waffle bar and bottled water.

The Pickle Barrel banquet hall is affordable and well-appointed.

Alcohol is sold separately and alcohol packages are available for $25 per person.

Ross says one of the most popular specialty dishes offered is Chicken Supreme, chicken breast served with a Marsala sauce and roasted-squash soup.

Some of the buffet choices include hand-carved pastrami, brisket and whole salmon, in addition to a selection of several salads and side dishes.

She recommends the hot hors d'oeuvres, noting that one of her favourites is the Asian noodles.

Wedding packages start at $5,700 for 75 guests, with $45.99 (plus tax and gratuities) for each additional guest.

The package is similar to the other with the addition of specialty linen, chair covers, custom-designed fresh floral centrepieces, a custom-designed photo signing board, a specialty celebration cake, bartender and full service staff.

All the packages can be adapted and enhanced with such things as food stations and specialty dessert novelties such as a chocolate fountain, adds Ross.

The Harold Soupcoff Room is an ideal setting for engagement parties and special occasion brunches – they start at $25.99 per person – such as baby namings and milestone birthday parties, for a minimum of 75 people, says Ross. "The brunch is amazing. We have a made-to-order omelette station, which is like an entertainment feature. There's a waffle bar, whole smoked salmon. It's fabulous."

The Rose Room (416-984-5348), at the Leslie Street Pickle Barrel (5941 Leslie St.), offers a well-priced package for kids' parties, she says. "It's ideal for someone budget oriented."

The $2,699 package is geared to a minimum of 50 people, with an additional charge of $21.99 (plus tax and gratuities) for each additional person. "It's a great venue for a kids' party," she says.

The price includes a Magen Boys' DJ package, a special occasion cake, balloon décor invitations, sign-in board, a party co-ordinator and a buffet with such kids' finger foods as fries, chicken fingers, spring rolls and chicken wings. Vegetables and dip, party sandwiches, pasta, garlic bread, caesar salad, a cookie platter or frozen yogurt are also part of the buffet offerings.

This room can hold a maximum of 110 people, says Ross. "It's a nice room. It's the best price for the quality of the food and entertainment.

"For great value and amazing food, you can't beat the Pickle Barrel."

Cancer fundraiser adds tzedakah to the celebration

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You could say that Leore Davidovitz's bat mitzvah was a double mitzvah.

That's because she and her parents, Bill Davidovitz and Sharon Bar David, held a tzedakah-themed kids' party to raise funds for the Princess Margaret Hospital.

On Oct. 10, just two days after she became a bat mitzvah, Leore, 12, a Grade 7 student at the Toronto Heschel School, and 40 friends performed a group mitzvah for her kids' party. They sold raffle tickets and hand-made flower pens, in support of the Princess Margaret Hospital and raised $1,500.

The fundraiser was in memory of Leore's neighbour Carie Elgar, who died last year of leukemia at age 41.

"Leore was very moved by Carie's death," Bar David recalled. "She was very aware of the illness, because she's best friends with Carie's stepdaughter, Fredi Kent.

"They're the same age. They've been friends from birth. They spent half their lives together. So there was almost daily contact throughout the illness.

"Carie's death made strong impression on my daughter. She had previously resolved to do a tzedakah event for her bar mitzvah. Initially, it was to fight AIDS in Africa. She changed her mind and decided to do it for Princess Margaret in Carie's memory."

The money was directed for a private doctor/leukemia-outpatient conference room at the Princess Margaret. On her last visit to the clinic, Elgar had wanted to speak privately with her oncologist, but they couldn't find a space, Bar David recounted.

"Their meeting was postponed until next time. But there was no next time. Two or three days later, she fell into a coma from which she never recovered."

The family chose to do a bat mitzvah party with a tzedakah theme after hearing about a similar kind of fundraising event.

They were in Montreal for a wedding over the summer and another guest described a tzedakah bar mitzvah that she had attended, Bar David said. "We were immediately hooked on the idea of doing something similar for Leore."

One Tuesday after school, Leore and her young guests met at the Bathurst JCC, the headquarters for their fundraising party. The children were split up into groups of four – each accompanied by an adult chaperone – and they were sent to a number of streets in Armour Heights and Bathurst Manor to sell the flower pens and raffle tickets.

Corporate donations for the event came from the YM Group. The company donated the $350 in prize money for the winning ticket, and a family member gave $180 for the second prize.

"Princess Margaret was involved from the start," Bar David said. "They supported the event with a letter and they gave 'Conquer Cancer' rubber-band bracelets to all the participants."

The event began with a discussion over pizza about cancer and fundraising, Bar David said. "I started by asking if anyone in the room knew someone touched by cancer."

Thirty-eight out of 40 children raised their hands.

"When asked if anyone in the room wanted to make a teensy tiny difference to fight the disease, everyone raised their other hand."

All the children were aware they were going out to raise money, as their parents had all been notified, she said. "They knew that the bat mitzvah was going to be different, but they didn't know exactly what it was going to be."

Before being sent out to canvass, each group had a discussion led by their respective chaperones to plan their canvassing strategies.

"They talked about how the children would establish credibility going door to door – how they would explain the cause, Bar David said. "They had to strategize. They had to create conditions for success and a plan do deal with rejection."

They went out for an hour, and the experiences varied from street to street, she said.

"One area had donated to the Princess Margaret the week before. In Armour Heights, a lot of people had donated money for the recent marathon for breast cancer, so the group went to another area. The groups had to think on their feet and to change their plans, because their reality on ground had shifted. They said, 'This street is used up, let's move to another street.'"

She described the mood of the children as very upbeat. "Overall, the children were very enthusiastic."

And there were prizes for enthusiasm, she added.

The children returned to the JCC, after an hour for dessert and to tally their results, as well as to draw for the prizes and contact the winners.

"That was amazing," Bar David said. "It was exciting to see it all coming to a climax, with the children hearing the winners' responses.

"Several of the children came up to me and said they would have liked to have had the chance to canvass longer. Several thanked me on that day and afterward for a great experience.

"Leore was so proud. not only that she had honoured Carie's memory, but also that her bat mitzvah was a real mitzvah event."

Kids' party activities: painting ceramics and dancing

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

The Clay Room (416-466-8474), a popular venue for children's birthday parties, has been a fixture on the trendy Danforth strip since 1995.

Located at 279 Danforth Ave., The Clay Room, a paint-your-own ceramic studio, offers a range of children's party activities, summer and holiday creative art camps, and drop-in ceramic painting for all ages, says owner Desiree Maklin.

It's an ideal setting for school groups, adult parties like bridal showers and corporate team building, she notes.

Maklin bought the business a year and a half ago, and she's currently in the process of renovating the party room, she says.

The studio boasts two kilns and a wide selection of pre-formed ceramic bisque pieces, including Judaica items like menorahs, kiddush cups and seder and matzah plates.

Beth Torah and Adath Israel's congregations' religious schools booked menorah painting, and they're returning in the spring to do seder plates, says Maklin, adding that there are special rates for school groups.

She says The Clay Room offers two types of birthday parties. The creative clay party lets children make their own clay pieces, or they have the option of painting pre-formed pieces. "Every thing gets fired and clear-glazed, and the party items are cellophane wrapped."

The paint-your-own birthday parties – they start at $14 per child. – usually last about two hours. Typically, the painting and instruction are an hour, with the second hour allocated for pizza, cake and present opening, says Maklin.

The creative clay session runs an additional 30 minutes, because it takes more time to learn how do the pinch pots and pressed forms or to do freehand structures.

The party items are usually ready for pick up within a week and a half. With walk-in customers, the turnover is one week, she says. "During the summer and holidays, there's lots of walk-in traffic. I see a lot children and adults."

The Clay Room offers creative ideas for children's, and adults', parties.

While Maklin had three months of intensive training when she took over the business, she also hired students from the Ontario College of Art and Design (OCAD) who are majoring in ceramics to teach the classes and run the parties.

She requires a minimum of 12 children for kids' parties and eight people for adult paint-your-own parties.

"The Clay Room is a great setting for corporate team building," Maklin says. "It gives you the ability to be with your co-workers in a relaxed setting. You get to be creative and you have time to talk."

She says some of her clients do takeout or home parties, which can be done with or without her instructors. "We supply equipment – brushes, paint, palettes and colour samplers, which can be picked up and brought or delivered to the party for the children to paint."

These pieces come back to The Clay Room for firing, she says. "The paints are non-toxic and washable, so these parties lend themselves to home parties."

The ceramic painting offers customers a wide choice in bisque, and Maklin also tries to fill people's requests for unusual pieces. "We call Ontario suppliers of greenware [clay that has not been fired]. There are moulds of everything you can imagine."

The Clay Room can also do custom orders because the OCAD students can produce their own moulds, she says.

Ceramic items include picture frames, pitchers and all kinds of home and garden décor, says Maklin. "We even have garden gnomes."

During March and the summer holidays, there are half-day, week-long programs that offer a variety of creative crafts that include T-shirt painting, papier-mâché, beading and jewelry making in addition to clay and ceramic work.

The children have a terrific time here and so do the adults, says Maklin. "The Clay Room is a really happy place.

"Everybody who comes in is coming to do something artistic or creative. They're all coming in to enjoy themselves."

Keri Saltzman of Keri's Dancin' Kids (905-731-5146; e-mail kdancekids@rogers.com) offers a totally different kind of children's party.

Saltzman – she specializes in dance and communications – has been running dance and interactive parties for children for eight years.

"The primary focus is on dance," she says. "For the tween set what we do is interactive. Hip-hop is very popular. We also do simchah dancing. We do creative-based and more imaginative dancing for younger children.

"We offer different packages, which can also include arts and crafts, creative movement and co-operative games for both boys and girls."

The parties, which are customized for each child, generally take place at people's homes, as well as in outside venues, she says

"The most important element of our service is that we actually cater to the individual child. Every child is different. Therefore every group is unique and every party is unique.

"I have had families where I've done four or five birthdays. People call me back. They know the new party will be different. I am constantly updating the music and dances and different components of the parties."

The High School Musical party is one of her most frequent requests, she says. "Theme parties are for all age groups. It's amazing how popular these parties are."

Physical and creative activities for the kids

Saltzman's own background is perfectly suited to her interactive parties. She did competitive dancing, performing hip-hop, tap and jazz for 17 years, and she has recently taken up flamenco dancing. "I had a lot of opportunities to perform in professional shows and do interactive entertainment. I also did competitive dancing all over Canada and the U.S."

A graduate of York University, Saltzman has an honours degree in communication studies. "It allowed me to learn and grow in many ways," she says.

She incorporated her interactive dance program when she taught English as a second language in Spain in 2005. She is now certified to teach English as a second language and uses the interactive dancing as a teaching tool. "I speak Spanish fluently and so I can also do Spanish-themed parties."

She has had extensive experience running children's programs as a dance specialist and co-ordinator of arts at various local camps.

She says all her staff are at least 18 years old and have the maturity to work with the children. "The staff come from the places I teach or they are people I dance with. I look for high-energy, interactive people who are mature and outgoing.

"They need to know how to have fun with kids and to be responsible. They're there to find out who these kids are and how to make the party most memorable. We brainstorm to come up with customized parties."

These days Keri's Dancin' Kids includes two other members of the Saltzman family, as sisters Jackie and Stacy, also interactive entertainers, now play a role in the business.

Saltzman also offers after-school and lunch programs.

A typical party lasts two hours, 15 minutes, but one-hour packages are also available.

The longer packages start with a 45-minute to one-hour interactive dance time. There is a break in the middle for refreshments before the second activity starts. In the second half of the party, the children participate in a different activity such as karaoke, nail art, arts and craft, face-painting or a co-operative game.

Saltzman now does many parties for boys. "Dance has become gender neutral," she says. "Whether it's hip-hop or break-dancing, I'm finding more boys are interested in dance classes."

She also runs an adult and corporate division called Energized Entertainment for corporate and private parties. She has done events for camps, community centres and Jewish communal groups.

Keri's Dancin' Kids' birthday parties are generally geared to children aged two to 12, says Saltzman. "Our motto is 'energize the party.' We cater to the kids and that pleases the parents."

Finding the perfect gifts need not be hard

With the holidays just around the corner one thing is certain: you'll be needing plenty of gifts.

And if you want to give someone you love a memorable token of affection, then find your way to Mark Lash Fine Jewelry (9033 Leslie Street. No. 8, Richmond Hill or 938 Eglinton Ave. W. in Toronto).

Whether it's diamonds, precious stones or gold you're looking for, they have it all in a variety of styles and designs, and you can always count on their impeccable workmanship and customer-friendly staff.

According to director Dalia Lash, the hot new trend this year is yellow gold.

"It's making a comeback," said Lash. "For a while we weren't selling much of it, but people have been demanding it and are starting to wear it mixed with white gold and [precious] stones. It's a great look."

Lash advises customers who want to pre-order custom-made jewelry to do so three to eight weeks in advance.

"But we've been known to turn around [jewelry] in a day or two for rush orders," she said.

They can also upgrade existing jewelry for those looking to spruce up their old baubles.

"If someone's been married for 20 years and decide they want a new ring or new stones to create an updated look, we can do that," said Lash.

Mark Lash is also doing something special this year.

From Nov. 15 to Dec. 24, both store locations are selling specially crafted wishbone necklaces with 100 per cent of the proceeds benefiting the Children's Wish Foundation.

The necklaces, available in sterling silver, yellow or pink gold, are diamond encrusted and range from $125 to $950.

"It's a great Chanukah gift and will allow children's wishes to come true," said Lash.

For more information visit: www.marklash.com or call 1-866-881-5229.

And if your gift tastes run more towards the funky and eclectic, then a visit to colourful Heart To Find Designs in Thornhill is recommended.

Owned and run by artisan-cum-businesswoman Riette Newman, the store houses an array of gifts for the home and beyond.

You can find everything from costume jewelry to menorahs, decorative seder plates to mosaic mirrors, as well as a plethora of artisanal glassware and much more.

"My niche is being different than every other [gift] store," said Newman. "I try to have as many artists' works as possible."

Heart To Find also has a heavy Israeli flavour.

"I love to bring in products from Israel, and I [actively] source out Israeli art for my store. Half of my Judaica comes from Israel," she said.

Newman is also a trained interior designer. Though she doesn't do house calls, she's happy to consult with customers in-store and help them pick out items that fit perfectly with their home decor.

"I'm very focused on customer service... and very [handson] for my customers," she said.

This year Heart To Find Designs is also offering a new service: on-site engraving of leather dog-tags and bracelets for special events.

"We go around on the bar/bat-mitzvah circuit and sit there engraving names for the kids. It's a really cool concept and huge in the States," said Newman.

Heart To Find Designs also offers a bridal registry and corporate gift services.

For more information on Heart To Find Designs, visit the store at 7355 Bayview Avenue, Suite 211, or call 905-731-1092.

Fairmont Royal York Hotel's elegant concert hall

Make your simchah even more special at the Royal York

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

If you want to host an event to remember in Toronto, you need look no further than the historic Fairmont Royal York hotel.

At the epicentre of the theatre, financial and entertainment districts, this grand venue has earned a reputation for excellence in service and accommodations, and event staff at the hotel want it known that it's also a prime spot to throw a simchah.

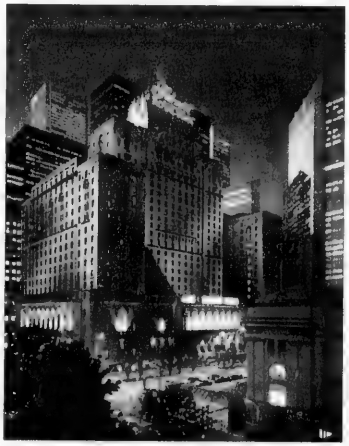
In addition to having some of the finest cuisine in the city, the Fairmont Royal York has seen fit to accommodate kosher needs as well.

Fernando Teixeira, the hotel's director of conference services and catering, explains how the hotel provides for its esteemed kosher clientele.

"We work exclusively with GMB Culinary Productions," he says. "They work with us in advising what steps we need to take in terms of cleanliness preparation for the mashgiach they bring in." It's a process Teixeira has become accustomed to and relishes after seven years working at the hotel.

"In our experience in trying to cater and market to the kosher client, we find that the majority of the events have been weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs and some fundraising events," he says. "So they are looking at our bigger rooms and convention floor, for the most part."

According to Teixeira, no venue has more cachet than the Fairmont for an event. In fact, certain rooms in the hotel are so in demand that would-be clients are well advised to book them at least one year in advance.



The Fairmont shines bright at night in the heart of Toronto.

"We've got some great venues that speak for themselves. The concert hall and the ballroom, with its 20-foot ceilings and chandeliers, take you back to an old-world feel that you can't duplicate anywhere else in the city," he says with pride. "We're a part of the Toronto landscape, so it's a great place to have an event."

Teixeira says there is also plenty of room for parking at the hotel and it is accessible by car from the Gardiner Expressway, the Don Valley Parkway and all points around the downtown core.

He adds that the hotel typically does not keep a waiting list for reservations beyond one year. But if a client really wants a reservation more than a year away, the staff advises them to call back about a year in advance with assurances that something can be worked out at that time.

The Royal York typically does anywhere from five to 10 kosher events per year, as well as numerous non-kosher events that do not, however, include shellfish, meat and dairy together, or pork, Teixeira says.

No matter what the event, he has heard nothing but praise for the work the hotel does on its clients' behalf.

"The success of our venue is based on word-of-mouth and we've received great feedback," he says. "Our physical backdrop is fantastic and the quality of food GMB caterers provides is, in my opinion, second to none. You put all that together and you end up having a very wonderful event."

For more information about booking your event at the Fairmont Royal York, visit www.fairmont.com/royalyork/ or call their reservation line at 1-800-257-7544.

Mint Lifestyle Events takes a personal approach

By JORGE KRANE
Special to the CJN

In the summer of 2005, longtime friends and colleagues Jared Florence, Jordan Fogle and Noah Cappe joined forces to shift their approach to traditional event-planning and execution by creating Mint Lifestyle Events.

"It was a great formula years ago," says veteran entertainer Florence. "Clients could easily be slotted into a number of pre-determined event packages and receive a spotless, methodical performance that more than fulfilled their expectations."

While the formula has been, and is currently, successful for some companies, the Mint team says they chose a fresh new philosophy.

Rather than mass market a full-service events company that claims to be all things to all people, Mint has adopted a boutique approach.

"The typical Mint client is willing to explore the limits of imagination and energy, and, overall, demands a calibre of service and experience not easily found in today's special-event marketplace," Fogle says.

So beyond its individualized approach, what is Mint?

"I can remember our first creative meeting. At first I thought the name sounded a bit too trendy, but there was still something there to be explored," says creative director Jeff Kahane.

"Being 'mint' is not about wearing lime green polo shirts at the country club," Kahane says. "Rather, it's a state of mind where celebrating the magic of life has no limits."

Mint Events offers a wide range of client services, from its highly successful birthday party division, Movemint, to its recently launched social club, Soiree, which offers private thematic dinner parties with entertainment such as lounge singers, belly dancers, salsa lessons and casino nights.

"Our clients occasionally comment about the lack of regular social events targeted specifically for their age group," says Cappe. "Creating Soiree was an initiative to connect groups of people who find themselves seeking an innovative and fun way to meet new couples and singles, young and old."

Mint's thriving corporate division is in the midst of preparing for some of its most elaborate holiday parties and international corporate retreats to date, and Mint continues to branch into new areas, with events in New York, Los Angeles and even Houston.

In 2007, Mint is planning its most challenging event so far, creating an invitation with actual working video game and transforming a unique event space into a living circuit board complete with specialized set design, animated characters, concert production and celebrity appearances.

For more information about Mint, call 416-923-MINT (6468), or visit www.mintevents.ca.

Mint Lifestyle Events is about a state of mind.

Beyond the dessert table: handwriting analysis

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

There is an alternative to the dessert table for entertainment at your next family or business gathering: one-on-one handwriting analysis.

Elaine Charal (416-446-2903, www.interlog.com/~hwriting) is a certified graphologist and graphoanalyst – basically, she analyzes handwriting full-time, all the time. Give her a sample of your scrawl – even just a signature – and she'll discover some of your innermost personality secrets.

That may sound heavy, but she's an entertainer foremost. "I always emphasize the positive," she says, unearthing good characteristics such as determination, initiative and confidence.

Her client list, from private individuals to corporations such as Bank of Montreal, Reuters and Astra Pharma, proves that handwriting is a terrific ice-breaker for any crowd.

"It's a great way to generate new conversation, especially for those who come to a corporate event and don't feel totally comfortable with socializing, not just talking shop," she says.

Charal loves family events, where she'll do handwriting analysis for couples together, or children and parents. She'll build up a parent in the child's eyes, pointing out "your mother is so fantastic, analytical… she knows what she wants."

For Charal, the fun of handwriting analysis is not at all incompatible with self-improvement, and while fun, may also sometimes suggest areas of potential change.

Elaine Charal

Actually, that's what got her into handwriting: a graphologist examined her writing and identified hidden character traits.

"I thought, 'Wow, there has to be something to this.'"

She's changed her writing, incorporating straighter downstrokes on her Y's, for example, to boost determination, and eliminating "soft-topped" S's to become more steadfast.

Charal says changing her writing has made a difference, and she offers an upbeat, interactive keynote talk, "The Power of the Pen," that helps people understand the strokes of their writing and communicate better with friends, family or business associates.

Everybody who sits down with Charal receives a written copy of her analysis as a memento – and perhaps as a source of self-awareness.

Charal's rates for handwriting analysis are between $100 and $150 per hour, but "I always try to work within people's budgets… a little party for 10 women is different than quoting for big corporate affair."

What about doctors' famously illegible handwriting? "There are very few handwritings that I've seen that are totally illegible. At a recent bar mitzvah, one boy's writing was totally illegible."

But especially with a child, she says, "I'd emphasize the originality of the script" rather than seem insensitive.

Centrepiece program adds tzedakah to simchahs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section (416-633-5100), has given new meaning to bar/bat mitzvah centrepieces.

Linda Steinberg, service chair, and Debbie Wasserman, president, are urging people to put together "simchah baskets" for their next celebration.

The baskets include items that the organization will use for its Just for Me project, in which volunteers fill knapsacks with school supplies and small items of clothing; and for its Drive for Dreidel campaign, a program in partnership with Jewish Family & Child Service and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, for which NCJW collects Chanukah gifts for youth in need.

Steinberg says the idea for the baskets originated with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, but about four years ago, federation approached NCJW about taking over the program.

"It is a great fit for us, because many of our programs focus on poverty in the city. Since we began, we have received about 500 baskets."

Those interested in the project, she says, should contact NCJW, "and we will tell them what we need. The knapsacks are usually filled with items such as books, toys, puzzles, knitted goods, crayons, pens and pencils.

"Hosts then buy all the items and have the baskets made up. After the simchah, the baskets come to us, and we distribute everything."

NCJW provides a card to go with each centrepiece so guests know where the baskets are going, she says, and NCJW sends a thank-you note to the bar/bat mitzvah child.

"These children are usually quite pleased with what they're doing, because it fits in with the tzedakah part of their bar/bat mitzvah program. It's a 'children for children' program."

She added that tax receipts are issued for the contents of the basket.

Simplifying the search for the perfect shoe

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Finding a pair of shoes for your wedding that are as beautiful as they are comfortable can be a daunting task. Thankfully, we've found some shops that may have just the shoes for you!

Celebration Shoes (106 Yorkville Ave., www.celebrationshoes.com, 416-703-2789) has been specializing in customized bridal shoes for 14 years. If you want the shoes dyed, if you want beads added, if you want laces, Celebration can do it!

With a full stock of satin and silk shoes in store, Carma Saunderson creates a unique look for each customer. Once you have chosen a pair, any embellishment you choose can be added. Saunderson can even add sentimental trinkets to make the shoe more meaningful. And with prices starting at $120, anyone can afford such a one-of-a-kind service.

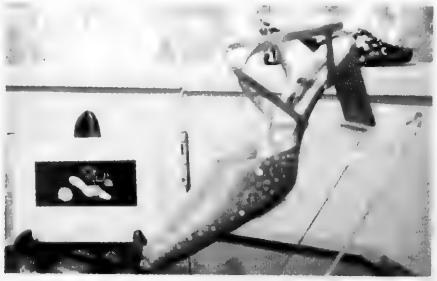
With a background in design, Saunderson opened the store after moving here from England.

"I was always designing outfits for my friends, but there were never any shoes to go with the outfits," she says.

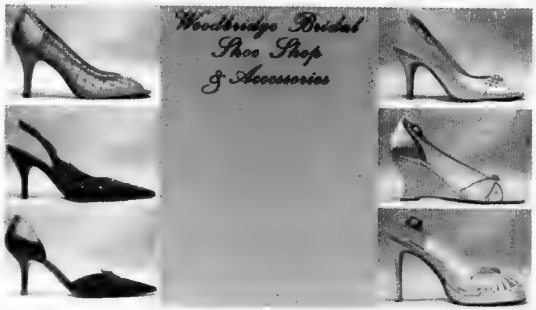
To make it even easier for you to get the look you want, Celebration also carries accessories, offering everything from purses to jewelry to quirky hats. While on a recent trip in Spain, Saunderson noticed a new trend – women were donning small, quirky hairpieces instead of large hats. In addition to solving the problematic issue of hat-head, these hairpieces liven up any outfit with their bright colours and decorative touch.

Although Celebration's shoes are meant primarily for bridal purposes, many customers come back to re-dye their shoes for other special occasions. And since the dye is chosen to perfectly match your dress, Saunderson recommends bringing a swatch to the store.

With such a quirky and colourful approach to design, Celebration Shoes can put the finishing touch to any special occasion outfit.



Celebration shoes puts the finishing touch to any outfit.



Woodbridge's selection can outfit the entire bridal party.

Woodbridge Bridal Shoe Shop (136 Winges Rd. 2nd floor, Unit 10, www.woodbridgebridalshoeshop.com, 905-265-2300) is another place to look for unique and quality bridal footwear. Offering a large variety of sandals, platforms and children's shoes, Woodbridge can outfit the entire bridal party.

Owners Lori and Mariella Sansone – who also run Canada's Bridal Show – know their customers. When the sisters noticed that the general selection of beautiful bridal shoes was very slim, they decided to open their own shop so that they could provide the shoes themselves.

For six years, Woodbridge Bridal Shoe Shop has built a reputation as the best one-stop-shop in town. But the expert staff will also help ensure that your overall look is cohesive, since the store is filled with gorgeous accessories and jewelry as well. And with such a friendly, warm staff on hand, you will love showing off your gown while matching it with everything in sight!

Any shoe in the shop can be customized to fit your specific needs. As well as being able to order wide and narrow fitting shoes, you can have them embellished with Swarovski crystals or any other decoration you choose.

And to help you feel lighter than air while dancing the night away after the service, Woodbridge Bridal Shoe Shop also sells jewelled ballet flats and flip-flops!

Whether your look is sophisticated, sexy or spunky, both Woodbridge Bridal Shoe Shop and Celebration Shoes have all the best styles to choose from. So be sure to head to one (or both!) to find the shoe that's perfect for you.

All kinds of possibilities to make your invitations unique

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Gail Shapiro decided to start a business, she opted for a creative venture. "I come from a fashion background. I decided to apply the fashion to paper."

Paper Expressions (905-764-9812), located at 50 Doncaster Ave., Unit 7, has gone through several growth spurts since Shapiro founded it five years ago.

Initially a home-based business, Paper Expressions outgrew the premises within a year and Shapiro moved to Doncaster Avenue. The business continued to expand and she relocated to a larger space in May.

About 1,000 square feet of the store is devoted to invitations, says Shapiro, explaining that Paper Expressions offers three options: people can order invitation packages from catalogues, they can choose imprintables – blank stock cards and invitations – and do the printing themselves, or they can opt for custom invitations. She adds that Paper Expressions can also do the printing on the imprintables.

She says she sells a lot of beautiful papers for people who want to make their own custom invitations.

Shapiro notes that there is a range of papers available for custom work, including shimmer paper, card stock that shimmers or shines; handmade papers from Canada, Japan and India; and Japanese and patterned papers.

The company does a lot of wedding invitations, she says, noting that the classic single card with some embossing or simple design continues to be popular, but many young couples are also selecting less traditional designs. "We're doing a lot of wraps and a lot more of them for weddings."

The wraps, which are customized, are encasements surrounding the invitations. Other custom invitation features include layered papers and pockets.

Place cards, another popular paper item, are usually co-ordinated with the decor, she says.

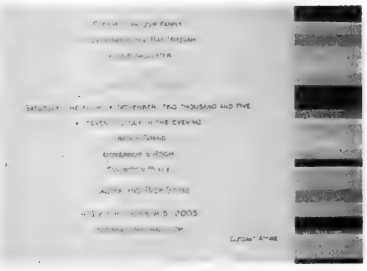
All the custom work is done in-house except for the thermography or raised printing, Shapiro says. "We do all the cutting, folding and assembly. We also address envelopes.

"Bar mitzvahs and bat mitzvahs are 99 per cent custom. Everyone wants to be different. Doing custom work allows you the flexibility to use your imagination to come up with something totally different."

Darcia Moskaluk-Rutkay started her company, Invitations by Design (416-789-7367, www.invitebydesign.com), seven years ago on the advice of her clients.

She had been running a copy shop for six years when she branched out into invitations, she says. "A lot of my clients led me in this direction. It was a natural evolution."

She has completely switched over her shop at 831 Glencairn Ave. at the corner of Marlee Avenue, and she is focusing exclusively on invitations and other printed items such as place cards and handmade envelopes. "We try to specialize so that we can give our utmost attention to invitations. Today, we do mostly bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings."



Invitations by Design

In fact, she says, while she and her staff are not Jewish, they have all learned to typeset in Hebrew. "We all recognize the letters."

Moskaluk-Rutkay says Invitations by Design is known for its unusual place cards. "We do all types of place cards. We do very unique ones. A normal place card is a folded card. We do tickets, triangular shaped cards. Anything that can be done with paper, we will do it."

In the last five years, Invitations by Design has been making its own envelopes because in Canada, finding coloured envelopes that match the colours of the invitations is very difficult, Moskaluk-Rutkay says. "It's pricier, but people want matching envelopes for their announcements."

She says she relies on a few suppliers for affordable coloured paper imported from various countries around the world. "The ones from India have lovely textures, and colours are very rich looking. European paper from Italy is very beautiful, but not readily available.

"Hemp papers and the more natural papers are also popular."

People can also choose invitation packages from catalogues, she says. "I try to keep it Canadian. The American invitations are very pricey, especially with the brokerage fees to get them across the border. The brokerage and transportation fees drive up the cost, which appears to be lower at the onset."

She says folded cards are not as popular as they once were because the invitees tend to rip the top off the card so that they can see the announcement and put it on the refrigerator. "My clients want something that looks nice on the fridge."

The single card is also popular for weddings. "We do a lot of Jewish weddings and many people want a thick card."

Monograms are in style, Moskaluk-Rutkay says, as are wrapped cards. "We often use bands, strips of paper in an encasement outside of the invitation. The cards can be encased in tissue with a band of contrasting paper that holds every thing together.

"Invitations with pockets on the back of the card or the fold-outs, for the reply card, maps, out-of-towners' information packets are huge," she says. "We make the pockets in different styles."

The length of time for getting the invitations can be a week or two for those ordered from the books, but the customized in-house creations take about three to six weeks, she says.

Moskaluk-Rutkay advises people to book appointments with her staff because she often leaves the office to see suppliers for the custom orders.

Party with the reptiles at Reptilia

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD

Usually, a 14-foot, 1,000-pound crocodile is bad news at a party – unless the party is at Reptilia's all-new 25,000-square-foot facility at Rutherford Road and Keele Street, where Induna, Canada's largest crocodile, is just one of many species guests can visit, enjoy and even hold.

Though party organizers wisely leave the jumbo croc in his enclosure for the festivities, all Reptilia parties include a hands-on visit with five friendly reptiles – a turtle, a small snake, a cayman (a small, alligator-like reptile), a lizard and, yes, a large snake, often one of several in-house boa constrictors.

While many "party places" are staffed by part-time high-school students, organizer Jason Orendorff (905-761-6223) says for most employees, Reptilia is a full-time vocation. All presenters have at least a university education and a genuine interest in and love of reptiles.

"This isn't a teenager coming to talk about his pet gecko," Orendorff says.

That's probably a good thing, because the kind of kid who wants a reptile party has usually done his or her homework.

"They're intelligent kids," says Orendorff, who's worked at Reptilia for four years. He says he often finds himself talking to seven-year-olds as if they were university students.

He credits the surge of interest, in part, to the late Australian crocodile hunter Steve Irwin. "He demystified reptiles," Orendorff says.

Both boys and girls love Reptilia parties, but the girls tend to be slightly older. Boys go through a "dinosaur" phase at around age seven that often includes reptiles. For girls, whether at parties, visiting the zoo or through trips in groups such as Girl Guides, getting to know reptiles is spurred by intellectual curiosity and the thrill of overcoming traditional perceptions that the creatures may be disgusting or slimy.

Reptilia has been in operation for 10 years, until recently in a converted commercial location one-sixth the size of its present home. While the old facility included one party room, the new location offers six and can host up to 24 parties each day.

Even the washrooms are reptile-themed.

Reptilia's zoo, open seven days a week, was previously a free, informal exhibit of aquariums on shelves. In the new, fully accessible location, with its diorama-style displays and feeding tours and special events, the zoo is rapidly becoming one of the GTA's most popular attractions for families, camps and school or social groups.

Most of the animals are new as well – the old location didn't have space for very large, exotic or venomous creatures.

Safety is paramount at Reptilia, at parties but also in the zoo and retail shop, where the company sells a limited selection of captive-bred, not wild-caught, animals.

All presenters carefully explain the importance of animal safety, and rules such as don't touch animals on the head, don't tug the presenter's arm if he or she is holding an animal, and don't tap aquarium glass because it hurts turtles' ears.

When Orendorff brings out a cayman at a party, its powerful jaws are taped shut not, he explains, because one has ever tried to bite anyone, but because kids – and even adults – sometimes forget and try to touch the mouth.

Kids and parents can choose from four basic party themes, offering five animals from different areas of the world. The party boy or girl gets to hold each animal, while every guest has a chance to touch it – but they don't have to.

The back seats in the party room are the "cringe row," for kids who aren't sure how they feel about reptiles, but most overcome their trepidation very quickly when everyone else is getting hands-on.

When the big boa constrictor comes out at the end of the presentation, everybody has a chance to hold it, and Orendorff says even those who were initially nervous take a turn.

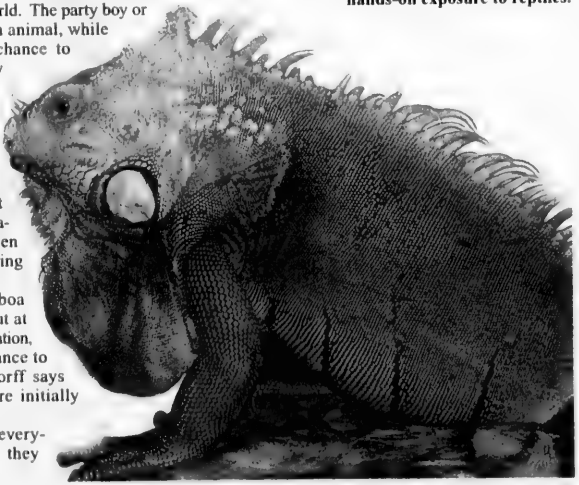
"When they see everybody else doing it, they want to join in."

Once the presentation is over, food is served, and the presenter stays with the group to supervise and answer questions. Reptilia can provide food for all parties, except kosher parties or for kids with severe allergies.

After the party's over, guests and their hosts can linger as long as they like in the long corridors of Reptilia's 15,000-square-foot zoo, visiting reptiles that aren't used for parties, such as the exotic albino monocled cobra and the venomous reptiles that make up approximately 60 per cent of the centre's new collection.

Parties at Reptilia start at $259 for 13 people (it's $15 per person above that). Loot bags are also available, stuffed with items from the reptile-themed gift shop, from $4.99 each. Larger parties can be hosted in Reptilia's theatre or Tortoise Room and feature seven animals instead of five.

And if the thought of driving a minivan full of kids to Vaughan is daunting, Reptilia offers in-home parties, also featuring five reptiles, at $185 for a one-hour presentation. While there's no limit on the number of guests at a home party, Orendorff suggests a "manageable" number so that every child has a chance to touch and view the animals.



Children love the look and feel of the hands-on exposure to reptiles.

Gladstone's sets new standard in fine kosher dining

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Gladstone's Wine Bar and Grill (416-487-9500) represents the new face of glatt kosher fine dining in Toronto.

For many people, kosher restaurants are establishments offering simple, traditional fare geared to families.

Ambiance is usually not a strong point.

Gladstone's is the antithesis of this kind of restaurant. This elegant eatery in the upscale Eglinton Avenue and Avenue Road area (398 Eglinton Ave. W.) is known as much for its stylish decor as its innovative kosher menu.

It also boasts live music, with pianist Steve Schulman at the grand piano keyboards nightly.

This elegance and sophistication has made Gladstone's a popular venue for simchahs, parties and corporate events. The restaurant, which is under COR supervision, can accommodate as many as 300 people for cocktails or 225 for a sit-down dinner, with room for a DJ and a dance floor.

The design of this stylish two storey 6,000-square-foot restaurant is striking, with its granite and glass facade, earth-tone palette, open mezzanine, 30-foot sushi bar and cozy lounge area with leather club chairs and fireplace.

Beside the "wow factor when people see this beautiful restaurant, we're known for great food – great steaks and fish, chicken and lamb," says Gino Falcitelli, Gladstone's general manager.

The menu offers such gourmet fare as duck tortellini, Moroccan cigars and Thai cornish hen, he adds.

Falcitelli has been with the restaurant since it opened in January 2005. Raphy Amar is the owner.

Falcitelli, who previously owned and operated a restaurant on the site of Gladstone's, helped Amar oversee the renovation, the training of the staff and menu development.

"Kosher food is almost exclusively what I eat now. In the beginning, working with kosher ingredients was a learning curve," Falcitelli says.

"Once we learned what ingredients we could and could not use, there was no reason why we couldn't be one of the best restaurants in the city, regardless of the kosher designation," he adds.

"The menu has evolved. We're always offering new and exciting items."

And the food has wide appeal, he says, even to people who don't keep kosher, but it's also become a destination for out-of towners who are kosher, Falcitelli says.

"We have people coming from New York for the weekend to dine at Gladstone's. They compare us to some of the best restaurants in the world. It's a very nice compliment."

Falcitelli says Gladstone's menu now includes sushi pizza and spicy salmon tartar.

"Sushi pizza is a crispy rice biscuit topped with spicy salmon, apple wine and onions. Spicy salmon tartar – it's very new– is fresh salmon sashimi served with crisp Asian pears. With sushi, anything goes."

The chefs are always trying new dishes, he says.

"We have all those items that are typical, like steak, lamb, fish and poultry, and then some innovative dishes."

As an example, he cites the Mediterranean Duo, consisting of a Moroccan cigar, a crispy pastry shell filled with seasoned beef, paired with merguez, a 100 per cent beef mini sausage, and served with a tahini dipping sauce.

Falcitelli stresses that all of Gladstone's pasta is fresh, made in-house from scratch.

He says one of the most popular pasta dishes is duck tortellini in a tomato-based sauce made with caramelized onions and coconut cream.

In addition to simchahs, Gladstone's is a popular place for business meetings and corporate events, Falcitelli says.

"We have a private dining room for corporate use that's wired for a plasma television. It holds up to 35 people comfortably."

He says that people can book the whole restaurant or the mezzanine, depending on the size of their party. "The menu is tailor-made for each affair. We go over preferences, tastes and price range."

He says no matter how many diners there are at a gathering, patrons can count on great service and high quality.

"Even if you're one of 200 people, we try to make you feel as if you were there having an intimate dinner for two," Falcitelli says.

"It's the same excellent food and service that you would expect on a regular visit to the restaurant."

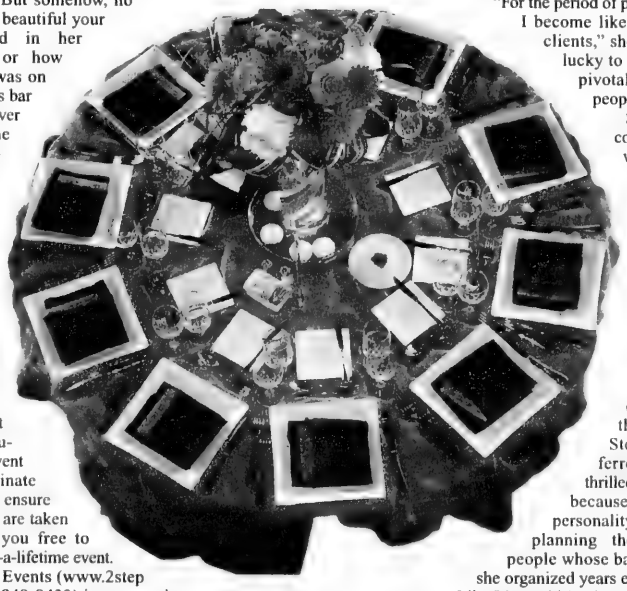
PARTY PLANNER

Get event planning help from an experienced professional

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Simchahs conjure up so many fond memories. But somehow, no matter how beautiful your daughter looked in her wedding dress or how proud your son was on the morning of his bar mitzvah, you'll never forget the time when your great-aunt had no table to sit at or the caterers served your vegan niece a chicken breast.



With all the stress that goes with planning a special occasion, the night of your dreams can quickly turn into your biggest nightmare. Fortunately, hiring an event planner to co-ordinate your simchah will ensure that all the details are taken care of, leaving you free to enjoy your once-in-a-lifetime event.

2 Steps Ahead Events (www.2stepsahead.ca or 416-949-9433) is one service that will help you plan every aspect of your gathering, making sure that the night is as perfect as it ought to be.

Vivian Ringwald-Levine, who spearheads 2 Steps Ahead, is bubbly and energetic and has years of experience in co-ordinating a variety of events. She is also organized and detail-oriented.

Working with three dedicated associate planners, Ringwald-Levine specializes in all simchahs, including weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs. She has become a maven in helping families co-ordinate the celebration when a son and daughter are having their bar and bat mizvah at the same time.

Offering a flexible and affordable service, 2 Steps Ahead can be booked to co-ordinate your event from the beginning or just to run the show on the big day. Ringwald-Levine can be involved in every aspect of planning – she will book the venue, make the invitations, and even mediate between family members, if necessary. Working within your budget, she recommends the best possible services, and will negotiate with the company to make sure that you get the most bang for your buck.

At 30, Ringwald-Levine has the insider's scoop on the newest hottest trends in simchahs. Whether it's giving your daughter advice on the perfect entrance song at her bat mitzvah or suggesting the most beautiful centrepiece arrangements, Ringwald-Levine understands how to adapt her knowledge to her clients' needs.

On the day of the event, 2 Steps Ahead is at the venue early to make sure that everything goes according to plan. "When I plan a wedding," she says, "I'm the last person the bride sees before she walks down the aisle. That's pretty powerful."

And Ringwald-Levine loves her work.

"For the period of planning the event, I become like family with my clients," she says. "I feel so lucky to be a part of such pivotal moments in people's lives."

She explains her company motto this way: "All eyes are on you, let our eyes be 2 steps ahead of every detail."

Another expert event-planning service is Judy Stein Consulting (905-764-2728). In co-ordinating simchahs for more than 28 years, Stein has been referred from one thrilled client to another because of her sparkling personality, and she is now planning the weddings of people whose bar or bat mitzvah she organized years earlier.

Like Ringwald-Levine, Stein will become involved in every step of planning your occasion. She will recommend, but never directly choose, the various services. She will also work within your budget and direct you to the services you'll appreciate most.

"It's just like matchmaking!" she says with a laugh.

And she offers personalized service. "I become your best friend for the next year."

Planners ensure your party goes off without any hitches. Pictures supplied by Judy Stein (top) and 2 Steps Ahead.

Two months prior to your event, Stein supervises a complete run-through to eliminate any possible glitches. She then prepares a detailed schedule and, along with three of her associates, supervises the day from start to finish.

And while paying close attention to your wants and needs, Stein will share her years of experience with you to ensure that you'll never have a "what was I thinking?" regret.

Stein loves her job. "Every weekend is another event!"

She gets her satisfaction from the joy her service brings. "I love seeing my clients so fulfilled and happy after making their dreams come to fruition," she says.

Stein donates a portion of her income from each event to the Starlight Children's Foundation, which helps make wishes come true for seriously ill children.

Enjoy Copper Creek all year round

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

You've probably heard of Copper Greek Golf Club in Kleinburg (905-893-3370, www.coppercreek.ca). You probably also associate the club with golf and the course designed by well-known architect Doug Carrick.

Copper Creek's director of food and beverages Doug Collier would like you to know the club better. He admits that it's best known among golf enthusiasts, but what is less known is that Copper Creek offers fine dining and drinking in an ambience that you can enjoy during any season of the year.

- ☑ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☐ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

Copper Creek is open all year round to all kinds of events, big or small, from corporate promotions to simchahs. It offers lunch and dinner every day of the week, and from October to May, there's Sunday brunch in the Bistro.

Spring, summer, fall or winter, the view of Cooper Creek's gardens and natural landscape is beautiful. Every room has ample windows, offering a panoramic view of the surroundings.

The club is set among the gently rolling hills and forests of the Humber Valley. Nearby, 40 acres of land have been donated to the conservation authority to protect this sensitive environment so it can continue to support the wild plant and animal species that are unique to this area.

Copper Creek can accommodate any kind of celebration, be it a family milestone or corporate event, intimate dinner or gala affair. Services include audiovisual facilities, sound and lighting, and disc jockey entertainment.

Both fine and casual dining are available. The decor is welcoming, with the quality of the food matched by attractive presentation. And Copper Creek staff are knowledgeable and ready to assist you.

The cuisine is superb, and you can custom create your own menu, including a kosher one, since a kosher kitchen is also available. Usually, large kosher dining parties are in the Valley View Ballroom, with smaller events often held in the Kleinburg Room.

Copper Creek is creative with non-traditional styles of kosher food, including vegetarian. For example, it offers risotto, pasta dishes and antipastos as appetizers.

One sample dinner menu features mandarin orange and raspberry spring mix salad; roasted two pepper soup; pan-seared salmon with ginger shitake sauce and root vegetables; brandied chocolate and banana crepes; and coffee and tea.

And here's a sample vegetarian menu: crespelle with tomato basil sauce; grilled vegetables tian on a bed of Mediterranean couscous; bread and butter pudding with raspberry and mango; coffee and tea. Menus include bread basket and relish tray.

The presentation is often non-traditional as well. Kosher food can also be served in a buffet, an informal style that encourages people to mix and mingle. Kosher catering is available for business and corporate events.

The Valley View Ballroom, for dinners with dancing, holds 120 to 130 guests. The Bistro, for casual dining, has a capacity of about 100, while the Kleinburg Room, for elegant dining, can accommodate about 60. All rooms have wheelchair access.

Unusual venues with unique menus

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Formerly known as SkyDome, the Rogers Centre was renamed in February 2005. It's the home of the Toronto Blue Jays and the Toronto Argonauts, and recognized as one of the premier event venues year-round.

The Rogers Centre is in the heart of downtown Toronto's entertainment district, near the CN Tower. Parking is available at Rogers Centre and in the vicinity. Public transit is within walking distance.

Levy Restaurants is the Rogers Centre's exclusive catering company. Kelli Steele is the manager of catering sales and special events for Levy Restaurants at Rogers Centre. She invites you to call for details, at 416-341-2364, or visit www.rogerscentre.com and www.levyrestaurants.com.

The Rogers Centre hosts private parties and events for groups from 50 to 40,000, in party rooms overlooking the stadium. You could watch a Blue Jays or Argonauts game. If there's no game, you can arrange entertainment such as a band or DJ.

Levy Restaurants offers great food and full catering options. And you'll enjoy the views from your seats. Windows banquet hall is on the north side, while the 400 Summit suite is on the southwest side. Both rooms overlook the stadium. Rogers Centre has other venues as well. The newly renovated meeting areas can host corporate meetings up to 300 people.

With a capacity of up to 1,000, Windows banquet room offers the best views of the field. It features Levy's trademark Chef's Table with specialties such as the All American BBQ, the Seafood Festival and the Taste of Tuscany.

King Solomon's Table: premier upscale kosher restaurant

Whether you're planning a sheva brachot dinner of 25 people or a wedding reception for 350, the wisdom of King Solomon's Table lies in its versatility.

Long recognized as one of the city's premier upscale kosher restaurants, King Solomon's Table, located at 3705 Chesswood Dr., has quickly made a name for itself since its 2005 reopening for its varied menu assortment and ability to accommodate different party sizes.

That flexibility lies in the fact that it's a restaurant, not just an event venue. During the week, sections of the spacious dining area can be closed off with portable partitions to create just the right sized private space – whether it's an intimate anniversary dinner, a larger family reunion or a milestone birthday party.

The restaurant can accommodate three to four parties simultaneously while still serving walk-in customers.

But owner Joe Elmaleh makes sure nobody gets lost in the crowd.

"Each individual group has a designated headwaiter who gives them undivided attention from the time they book the party to the time that they leave," he says.

For larger parties, exclusive use of the entire space is available on Saturday evenings and for Sunday lunch.

"Those times are reserved strictly for private parties," Elmaleh says. The entire dining area can hold up to 350 guests.

Because the space is so flexible, often not much notice is needed for smaller parties.

"It depends on the size of the event," says Elmaleh. "With the exception of Sunday nights, a week or two notice is more than ample. For Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, book it as soon as you have an idea that you're making it."

Once the event is booked, the kitchen will tailor the menu to your needs.

"Some might want the buffet, others prefer something more formal."

The fully licensed restaurant is renowned for its all-you-can-eat, 22-item Chinese buffet, but it also offers a range of Asian and other specialties, including meat, pasta, fish and vegetable dishes.

"You get whatever you want," says Elmaleh, adding that that goes for both the restaurant and several other halls around the GTA where King Solomon's Table operates its catering division, including the dazzling new Terrace Banquet Centre on Creditstone Road in Mississauga.

Many selections are also available to take out for smaller home or office functions.

"If somebody wants us to design a different type of dish, not one of our staple dishes they've come and sampled," King Solomon's creative chefs step in to fill the bill, Elmaleh says.

But usually, the menu itself is versatile enough to accommodate most needs, he adds.

Asian selections are usually a hit, including a gingery Thai beef salad. Middle Eastern favourites include Moroccan cigars, and the European menu is well-represented by beef tournedos, rib-eye medallions sautéed with wild mushrooms, fresh herbs and beef jus.

"We're not your traditional Jewish food," Elmaleh says. "We have a wide variety of salads and soups, vegetarian and fish dishes and main courses that will fit anybody's budget and eating lifestyle."

This non-traditional approach attracts a wide range of clientele, including observant Jews looking for a good kosher experience for a variety of guests.

Other clients don't normally keep kosher, but especially for Jewish occasions such as weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs, "they certainly want to entertain in a kosher venue," Elmaleh says.

Internet, high-tech changing gift registries

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Bridal registries are the best and easiest way to shop for your good friend who's getting married. Not sure what to buy the bride and groom? Find out what they want and get it for them. This simple concept has been the norm for years, but now, with the advent of the Internet, shopping for a wedding gift is even easier.

"The Internet is so important to registries now," says Jackie Chiesa, manager of William Ashley China (416-964-9111), a popular Toronto-based housewares store. "Couples are able to log on to the registry and add and delete items at 3 a.m. You used to phone in purchases, but now everything is at a couple's fingertips."

Stella Farrace, National Give Registry manager for the Hudson's Bay Company (416-861-6714), says she's seen a huge growth in online sales because of their registry's web access. "It's great because people can purchase things anywhere in Canada or internationally."

But while the method through which guests and couples access registries is changing, the way the registry works has stayed the same. At the Bay, or Home Outfitters, which is part of the HBC registry, couples can look around the store and put anything they see on their list.

Farrace says that in the past couples would haphazardly roam around the store choosing things at their leisure. Now, the process is more focused. "We start in the dining room and finish in another room. Before there was no mapped-out process. People were scanning stuff and, because people usually make about three appointments to pick things out, they would forget what they scanned. Now you start in a room. At the end of the room you're done with it, and you can move on to the kitchen, or the bedroom."

At Ashley's, the system works in a similar way. The couple comes in and meets with a registry consultant who can show them what glasses look good with certain plates, and then they look around the store choosing what they'd like. As simple as that sounds, Ashley's has made the process even easier. Since September, couples who come to the store to set up a registry have been given a hand-held computer – a Nokia tablet – that tells them what department they're in (the store has 17 departments), gives details of what they're looking at, and gives the option of adding items to their list. If the customer needs assistance, they can press a button on the tablet that'll call for a consultant, who can track them down using a GPS system. "We wanted to launch a device that was fast and fun and easy to work with for couples," says Chiesa. "The tablet just takes the registry experience to a whole new level."

At the Bay, or Home Outfitters, which is part of the HBC registry, couples can look around the store and put anything they see on their list.

Introducing the tablet wasn't just for convenience: more guys are involved in the gift selection process, and a lot of them like using this device. "Years ago it used to be the bride and mother picking out presents," says Chiesa. "Now it's the bride and her fiancé. They both have something to say about what they would like to use in the kitchen and dining room. Men want to choose knives, corkscrews, things like that. They're playing a much larger role in the kitchen than they used to."

Farrace sees more electronics being added to a registry. "Today, people register for LCD screens, big-screen TV's. We had a groom come in ecstatic because he registered for his LCD screen TV, and the guys at work got together and bought him a gift, a guy gift."

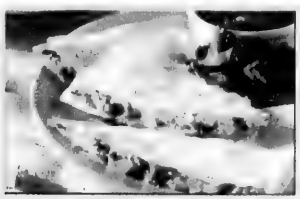
Still though, it's the housewares, like dishes, that people use the registry for most. Because these are items people will use for years, Farrace says it's important not to select things that'll only suit your needs now – think big picture. "Think about the entire home," she says. "And not just what you're living in today. Where do you see yourself in the next five years? Even if a couple doesn't have a dining room right now, we encourage them to register for a more entertaining style of dinnerware because in a year from now they may have a dining room. Now's the opportunity to get dishes."

But what if a couple moves into a new home before they get married and decides they want a different set of dishes? At the Bay and Ashley's, couples can easily exchange gifts that people buy them. "I think most people like the idea of creating a wish list where they're not bound to it," says Chiesa. "There's that security that after the wedding they can sit down and prioritize what they need most."

In order to make life easier for you and your guests, Farrace recommends setting up a registry 12 months before the wedding. "The trend has been six months, but that's moving to eight," she says.

"I say give yourself 12 months for two reasons. One, there's so much other stuff that you'll be doing, so complete it now so it's off your plate. There's also going to be gifting opportunities you might not know about [like a surprise shower], so why not get the stuff you want from the first opportunity."

As buying trends change, one thing that will remain constant is the need for good, and useful, gifts. "People have their own personal tastes and style," says Chiesa, "and guests are looking for some sort of direction. The bride and groom are happy because they get what they want, and guests feel good because they know they're buying something chosen by the couple."



CLOVER LEAF

Kosher entertaining with
CLOVER LEAF®

U Parve

...save your time & treat your taste buds!

Parties with Clover Leaf® are simple, easy, and delicious.
Here are just a few of our many mouthwatering recipes. Enjoy!

TUNA QUESADILLA WEDGES

Preparation Time: 15 min. or less • Cook time: 10 min.

1 can (170 g)	Clover Leaf® Flaked White Tuna, drained	2 tbsp (30 ml)	chopped cilantro or parsley
1/2 cup (125 ml)	shredded Cheddar cheese	6	small (6-7"/15-17.5 cm) flour tortillas
1/3 cup (75 ml)	mild salsa

Combine tuna, cheese, salsa and cilantro. Place 3 tortillas on large baking sheet sprayed with nonstick cooking spray. Divide tuna mixture evenly between tortillas and spread over surface. Top with remaining tortillas. Spray top of tortillas with nonstick cooking spray. Bake at 425°F (220°C) about 10 min. or until lightly browned and crisp. Cut into wedges and serve with additional salsa, if desired. Makes 24 appetizers.

FIESTA TUNA POTATO CASSEROLE

Preparation Time: 10 min. • Baking Time: 25 min.

2 cans (170 g ea.)	Clover Leaf® Chunk White Tuna, drained	1/2 cup (125 ml)	ea. chopped green onion & corn kernels
2	cooked baking potatoes	1 cup (250 ml)	shredded Cheddar
2 cups (500 ml)	mild salsa	Sour Cream (optional)

Preheat oven to 350 F (180 C). Cut potatoes into 1/2-in (1 cm) cubes, leaving skin on. Stir gently w/tuna, green onion, corn & salsa. Scrape into 7" x 11" (2 L) casserole. Sprinkle evenly w/cheese & transfer to oven. Bake 25 min. or until casserole is bubbly and cheese is melted. Serve with sour cream, if using. Makes 4 servings.

CREAMY TUNA ANTIPASTO DIP

Preparation Time: 10 min. • Microwave Time: 5 min. • Baking time: 15 min.

2 cans (170 g ea.)	Clover Leaf® Flaked White Tuna, drained	1/2 tsp (2 mL)	hot pepper sauce
8 oz (250 g)	light cream cheese, softened	2	green onions, finely chopped
1/4 cup (50 mL)	sour cream	1	large round pumpernickel loaf (about 12 oz/375 g)
2 cups (500 mL)	prepared vegetable antipasto	Assorted veggies and crackers

Preheat oven to 350 F (180 C). Blend cream cheese with sour cream until smooth in a microwaveable safe bowl. Stir in tuna and antipasto until well combined. Heat on HIGH in the microwave for 5 min. or until mixture is hot throughout. Stir half way through cooking. Stir in the hot sauce and green onions.

Meanwhile, hollow out the loaf of bread to make a bread bowl. Tear the bread from the interior into bite-size pieces. Reserve for dipping. Fill the bread bowl with hot dip and place on a baking sheet. Bake in oven for 15 min. until molten.

Serve with the reserved bread, assorted veggies and crackers for dipping. Makes 20 servings. Also tastes great as a cold spread!

ITALIAN SALMON PANINI

Preparation Time: 15 min. • Cook time: 4-6 min.

1 can (213 g)	Clover Leaf® Pink Salmon, Wild Pacific, drained	1/2 cup (125 ml)	lightly packed fresh basil or arugula leaves
3 tbsp (45 ml)	each mayonnaise and chopped sun-dried tomatoes	4	thin slices provolone or mozzarella cheese
1 tbsp (15 ml)	chopped capers	2 tbsp (30 ml)	Italian-style dressing or olive oil
1/4 tsp (1 ml)	pepper
4	flatbreads or pocket-less pitas

Preheat a grill or grill-pan to medium. Remove the skin and bones from the salmon if desired. Blend the salmon with the mayonnaise, sun-dried tomatoes, capers and pepper until well combined.

Divide the mixture equally and spread evenly over two of the flatbreads. Layer the fresh basil and cheese over each salmon-topped flatbread and top with remaining flatbread. Brush the dressing evenly over the outside. Grill the sandwiches and occasionally press lightly with a spatula for 2 to 3 min. per side or until well-marked and cheese is melted. Cut each sandwich into 4 wedges. Makes 4 servings.

Versatility is key when choosing a band

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

At any party, people's tastes in music are likely to run quite a gamut, from oldies to hip hop, to ethnic beats and grooves. This makes it crucial to find a band with a broad repertoire.

"Versatility is very important," says Morris Kast, leader of The Sky's Band. "When you're playing at a wedding, you have to cater to everybody and make sure you have a wide variety of music."

Kast notes that The Sky's Band is a 10-piece group with four singers, each of whom has a specialty, which enables the band to play a wide range of tunes.

Find a band with a broad repertoire

In addition to versatility, when seeking out the best band for your affair, it's advisable to find musicians who connect well with crowds.

Party hosts need to work closely with the band in order to iron out a music plan, so it's necessary to find a band leader whom you get along with.

"I'm a strong believer that the band leader must be very approachable," Kast says. "They must be open to the questions of the bride, groom and their families."

When it comes to selecting music, keep in mind that bands have extensive experience with many audiences and tend to know what kind of music works with specific crowds.

So while you may ask to have certain songs played, the band has the expertise to know when is the best time to play it.

Most bands are open to playing requests from the crowd, and if that's something you think is important, be sure to let the band leader know.

Watching a band play at other parties is a good way to get a sense of whether they're what you're looking for. But if you don't have a chance to see a band live, many bands have CDs and DVDs.

Word-of-mouth referrals can also be invaluable.

Bands book up quickly, so it's a good idea to schedule one year in advance for summer affairs and not less than six months in advance for other times of the year.

The Sky's Band can be contacted by phone at 416-565-1620 or online at www.skysband.com.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My grandson, Ryan, is going to be bar mitzvahed in 2007, and that's all I've heard about for the last two years.

But my daughter and son-in-law talk about everything except the things that I feel are important. They discuss the DJ, the theme, the caterer, the venue, etc, but I have yet to hear anything about the spiritual meaning of becoming a bar mitzvah.

I have always prided myself on being a grandparent who doesn't mix in. I feel it saves on bad feelings in the long run. I would, however, like to contribute something to this bar mitzvah that will add some spiritual value to balance out the "show." I don't want my input or participation to be misconstrued as meddling. I just want to do my small part.

More Meaning

Dear More Meaning

First, let me commend you on being able to sit back and watch quietly from the sidelines. That's very impressive.

Obviously, if you had your way, things would be handled differently, but that doesn't mean you can't do your part. How about incorporating the mitzvot of tzedakah and tikkun olam into the bar mitzvah. They can be included very tastefully, and I think everyone will approve.

Here are a few suggestions, but if you do a little research, the list is endless.

I came across a book called Mitzvah Chic by Gail Anthony Greenberg that has many interesting ideas to add relevance to becoming a bar mitzvah. There are programs that will help Ryan understand what it's like to be raised in a country where things as basic as food and education are a luxury. There are ways to integrate helping Israel, as well.

Almost any part of the affair can be incorporated into a meaningful and charitable function. The invitations, centrepieces, kippot and party favours can all be included. There are also interesting twinning programs that let Ryan twin with a less-fortunate child, or even a child that perished in the Holocaust before having an opportunity to become a bar mitzvah. It's just a matter of finding the right fit.

Mazal tov on Ryan's bar mitzvah. He's lucky to have you as a grandparent.

PARTY PLANNER

Remember to say thank you – and don't procrastinate

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements Co-ordinator

Happy events are worth celebrating and half the fun is entertaining the celebrant with parties and gifts. Certain events call for more than one function. For example, a girl gets engaged. Her female relatives and close friends may be invited to any one or several of the following: teas, luncheons, bridal showers, engagement parties and the wedding.

Some time after the newlyweds settle down, they usually welcome another blessed event – the birth of their first child. It's not unusual for close friends and relatives to fete the expectant mother by holding a baby shower. Soon after the baby's birth, the same folks are invited to a brit milah or baby naming.

These are special events to be enjoyed by all. People are pleased to buy gifts for these occasions and they often put a lot of thought into them. In their turn, the recipients are supposed to show their gratitude by writing thank-you cards. The good news is most people do. Not everyone expects the celebrants to answer promptly, but it is appropriate to acknowledge gifts within a month or so of the event.

"I can't go to every simchah, but I always send a gift," says Laura Levy, a 40-year-old teacher with three children under age eight. "I don't like to keep badgering people to find out whether they received the gift, but I am eager to know if it arrived. The worst thing is when people don't cash the cheques."

According to the Emily Post school of etiquette, people should wait until the date of their event before depositing or cashing the cheque. However, not everyone agrees with this philosophy.

Marilyn Ostrof is a 26-year-old travelling sales representative. "I'm single and always on the road, but most of my friends are married and starting their families. I'm always invited to showers, brits and baby namings. Whether I can go or not, I send gifts."

Ostrof says she often chips in with friends, who pick out the gift. "Last spring, I was invited to a baby shower and though I couldn't go, I chipped in for a present," she relates. "After my friend gave birth, I was invited to the baby naming. By then she had everything she needed, so I sent a cheque. When I didn't receive an acknowledgement, I phoned to see if she or her husband had received it. They had lost it and were too embarrassed to tell me. I wish they had, because we all wasted a lot of time worrying for nothing."

Kayla Grosweiner, who grew up in New York City, says she frequently receives wedding acknowledgements three or four months after the wedding. "Maybe, it's a sign of old age, but when they finally do arrive, I have to jog my memory. Unless it's a relative, I have trouble recalling whose wedding it was and I don't recognize the names. Perhaps that's because we get invited to many functions through my husband's work. I may be acquainted with the parents, but I usually don't know their children."

Styles have changed since the days of Jane Austen's novels, when a woman's sole focus was to find a suitable mate and behave in a ladylike manner, but expressing gratitude never goes out of style. Here is a quick, organized way to get the job done.

Create a folder on your computer or take a notebook and make columns noting the gift-giver's name, address and telephone number. Describe the gift and, if relevant, the store it came from. Make a note of the date you send out your thank you card.

If the address isn't on the card or envelope, use the phone book or go to Google on the Internet for a comprehensive listing that will provide postal codes as well as phone numbers and addresses.

As for your message, follow the KISS rule: "Keep it short and simple." For starters, write the big idea first. For example: 'Thank you for the kind wishes and generous gift on the occasion of our wedding.' If it's a gift other than money, be precise. Name and describe it. If possible, indicate how you will use or enjoy it. Thank the gift-giver for helping you celebrate the occasion. Then close off with "Best regards," or "Fondly," or "Love," and your first name. However, make sure your full name is on the card or envelope.

It's never too early to learn to say thank you, and bar or bat mitzvahs are terrific occasions to teach children the importance of conveying appreciation. Some parents say their children are too busy with school, homework and extracurricular activities. It's not worth all the nagging to get them to sit down and write the cards, the parents will say.

"It all depends on the child," says Marisa Schwartz, an elementary school teacher and mother of two teenagers. "My daughter was so intrigued with the idea of choosing notepaper and graphics that she regarded the exercise as a personal project. She even composed different messages on each card. But then so did her friends."

However, Schwartz admits it was a struggle getting her son to follow suit. "I will say, he studied for his bar mitzvah and did a fine job, but when it came time to write the thank you cards, he wasn't so diligent. Let's just say, I ended up writing a batch of them."

Check airline security rules when going out of town

When out-of-towners receive a wedding invitation in the mail, many will arrange for airline tickets to attend the event and extend the trip to enjoy a vacation. At the same time, the bridal couple will also be booking their honeymoon.

But airline travel has changed. To make the most of these special trips, Canadian passengers should check current security regulations.

Before you go to the airport, make pre-board screening more efficient by checking with the airline or travel agent to determine how early you have to arrive at the airport. Verify how many pieces of carry-on and checked baggage you are permitted to bring. Bring airline ticket, passport or valid government-issued photo identification. Tag baggage, including carry-on bags and portable computers. For security reasons, use your business address.

Dressing for travel hints is more important now than it was before Sept. 11, 2001. Wear shoes that can be easily removed, as passengers are often required to take them off for screening. Metal items may also trigger alarms. Pack your jacket in carry-on luggage to have it handy.

Carry-on luggage rules are also stricter than they used to be. Place personal items, for example, a toothbrush in a clear plastic bag. Electronic devices such as laptops must be removed from their bags for special screening. Preparing for this procedure increases the speed of processing. Sharp items such as pointed scissors and ice skates are not permitted in carry-on bags.

According to the Canadian Air Transport Security Authority, as of Sept. 26 this year, until further notice, the following measures will be in place. Passengers will be permitted to bring liquids, gels and aerosols through security screening at airports if the items are packaged in containers with a capacity of 90 ml or less and the containers fit comfortably in one clear, closed and resealable plastic bag of no more than 1 litre. One bag per passenger will be permitted.

Passengers may continue to bring aboard baby formula, baby food or milk if a child age two or under is travelling.

Liquid prescription medicine with a name that matches the passenger's ticket or boarding pass is acceptable.

Permitted and non-permitted items are regulated by Transport Canada. To be sure, contact Canadian Air Transport Security Authority (1-888-294-2202) or consult the Foreign Affairs Canada website for international travel tips at www.voyage.gc.ca.

The Astoria Shish Kebob House.

Astoria Shish Kebob House has two locations: 390 Danforth Ave., 416-463-2838; and 1970 Dundas St. E. in Mississauga, at Highway 427 and Dundas, 905-615-1444.

The Danforth location can host 190 guests, with room for another 100 on the patio. The Mississauga restaurant's capacity is 170, with room for another 30 guests on the patio.

Astoria Shish Kebob

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☐ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

For dining, at both locations, reservations should be made for groups larger than five. No reservations are required at the Danforth location on Saturdays.

While business is prospering at Astoria, franchises are not in the offing, says Peter Kerasiotis. The philosophy, as expressed by directing partner Kerasiotis, is to keep the business small enough that he can stay in personal touch with details and maintain the high quality he and his partners take pride in.

- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity

Astoria offers full-service, family-oriented casual dining. "Diners are guests," says Kerasiotis, who is enthusiastic about both food and people. "Guests are treated as well as if they were at home. This is our standard for food and service."

Kerasiotis has been in the restaurant business for more than 30 years. "We work hard," he says, smiling, "but we also work smart. And we love what we do."

Kerasiotis describes Astoria's cuisine as Mediterranean with a strong Greek accent. "It's an ancient tradition," he says; "but modern nutritionists hail this style." Nutritionally, it's rich, with varied and inviting tastes, and not heavy on spices.

"The ingredients are not wholly unfamiliar to North Americans. But along with well-known favourites like souvlaki, grilled seafood, hummus and Greek salad, there are many delicious surprises, including vegetarian dishes."

Among vegetarian selections Astoria offers are spanakopita, a spinach pie with a light, multi-layered phyllo crust; tzatziki, a blend of yogurt, garlic and olive oil; taramosalata (Greek caviar); and moussaka, a hearty dish that has been compared to lasagna.

The best dishes require the best ingredients. So Astoria uses only the best, including imported feta cheese and extra virgin oil, the purest olive oil.

Other non-kosher places to party are: Acrobat Lounge, 416-489-1105; Atlantis Pavilions, 416-260-8000; Captain John's Harbour Boat Restaurant, 416-363-6062; Casa Loma, 416-923-1171; Lotus Pond Vegetarian Restaurant, 416-412-3140; Eddy's Dining Lounge, 905-886-6566; The Estates of Sunnybrook, 416-487-3841; Fairmont Royal York Hotel, 416-368-2511 ext. 2657; Grand Prix Kartways, 416-922-5058; The Hard Rock Cafe/Club 279, 416-362-3636; The Honest Lawyer, 905-886-5879; Liberty Grand, 416-542-3789; Loots Lounge, 416-787-5668; Pickle Barrel, 416-990-5086; Richmond Hill Country Club, 905-731-2800; Scaramouche Restaurant/Pasta Bar, 416-961-8011; St. Andrew's Club & Conference Centre, 416-366-4228; Toronto Marriott Downtown Eaton Centre, 416-597-9200; Metropolitan Hotels, 416-977-5000.

Claramount Spa stresses wellness and pampering

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Claramount Inn & Spa in Picton, Ont., is on six acres in the heart of Prince Edward County's wine country.

The inn's brochure states, "Wellness begins here" referring to the three-year-old, cosy spa, located in the basement of an addition built onto the main house of a colonial revival mansion overlooking Picton Harbour.

The Claramount Inn & Spa

"Our theory at the spa is really based on wellness, as opposed to pampering, although you always get a sense of pampering when you are at a spa," says Tiffany Childerhose, the spa's director and hydrotherapist.

"Our philosophy is based on Sebastian Kneipp's therapeutic model – he was a Bavarian monk. He found he could heal people through what he called the five pillars of health – water therapy, plant therapy, exercise therapy, nutrition and the balance between rest and relaxation. We take from each of those pillars, and we put them into our treatments."

The spa's décor is in keeping with the rest of the inn. There are five treatment rooms, including the wet room, which is devoted to hydrotherapies and has a six-head Vichy shower. In the spa is a rest and relaxation area where herbal tea is served, and a small retail space.

All the rooms with windows are painted a soft blue. Walls in areas without natural light are a soft yellow. Floral fabrics on wicker chairs and window treatments and Canadiana prints of wildflowers and such add to the soothing ambience. Other amenities include a steam room, sauna, infrared sauna and heated, covered all-year-round salt-water pool used for individual and group aquatic exercise and for aqua-massage therapy aministered by a registered massage therapist.

In addition to hydrotherapist Childerhose, the spa's staff includes two registered massage therapists, three estheticians and a personal fitness instructor.

Claramount carries many product lines.

"With all our product lines, we try to find the most organic and pure forms," says Childerhose. "Our main product line for face and body is Éminence. It is a handmade organic skin-care line from Hungary. Our secondary line, used in our aromatherapy facials, is Source Vital. It is based on essential oils from Texas. We have a mineral makeup line from California called La Bella Donna – we are one of the first to carry it in Ontario. The founders of our nail line, Zoya, are originally from Hungary. It doesn't have tar or formaldehyde that you find in other nail products."

The Claramount has just launched a new spa menu. Treatments include three Éminence facials with optional extraction of blackheads, an aromatherapy facial, facial massage, manicures and pedicures, makeup applications and lessons and massages. Body care includes the Éminence Back Bliss and Vichy Massage Treatment and body wraps and polishes. Wraps and polishes include the Thalassotherapy Body Experience, the Moor Mud Body Masque, a Canadian product, and the Pear and Green Apple Body Polish. In the Pear and Green Apple Body treatment, the body is exfoliated with a pear and green-apple mask mixed with spices, followed by the Vichy shower with adjustable temperature and pressure. A hydro-massage through a hose follows. The treatment ends with Éminence Pear and Green Apple Soufflé, a moisturizer that is massaged into the skin.

The Kneipp Water Treatments include Vichy Therapy; Affusions, a treatment without using water pressure that helps stimulate the circulatory system; and the Wet Socks treatment, in which wet and dry socks are used to stimulate the metabolism.

In addition to the à la carte spa services, there are a number of packages on offer, including the Decadent Day, in which guests receive a Moor Mud Body Wrap, 60-minute Massage Therapy, an Éminence Vitality Facial, manicure, pedicure, hair and scalp treatment and makeup application.

Spa packages are based on double occupancy and include two-night accommodation in a spacious suite. The Glorious Spa Getaway includes a $150 spa credit, two breakfasts for two, one five-course dinner for two at Clara's, including wine, and one three-course dinner for two in Ameilia's Garden Dining Room, across town at the spa's sister property, The Waring House. The Soothe Your Senses Package offers one Éminence Facial and one Aromatherapy Massage in place of the credit and a $25 gift certificate for dinner at The Waring House.

Dion has walked a fine Mideast line

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — New Liberal leader Stéphane Dion, whose riding of St. Laurent-Cartierville has large Jewish and Arab communities, both traditionally supportive of the party, has endeavoured to walk a fine line on the Middle East.

In his speech at the party's recent leadership convention, Dion ridiculed "the very right-wing" government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper for modelling Canadian foreign policy on that of U.S. President George W. Bush's administration. "Today we have… a prime minister who is mirroring the style of his hero to the point that President Bush should be getting royalties from Mr. Harper's speeches."

Dion was critical of Harper's support of Israel during last summer's conflict with Hezbollah, calling for a more even-handed approach, because of Canada's friendship with Lebanon as well as with Israel, and urging an immediate ceasefire.

In an Aug. 6 Globe and Mail article, he wrote: "When one believes a friend to be mistaken, one should say so," and suggested that the Lebanese civilian casualties and "breadth of destruction" may increase support for Hezbollah and weaken the Lebanese state, without boosting Israel's security.

New Liberal leader criticized Harper's support of Israel in last summer's conflict with Hezbollah

In October, in a conference call with the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), Dion said he would not "change a comma" of what he wrote in August. He did call both Hezbollah and Hamas terrorist groups, and said Canada should not send aid to a Hamas-led government, but should aid the Palestinians through "third parties." He also agreed that Israel is being targeted unfairly at the United Nations.

When asked by The CJN whether he agreed that the "root cause" of the Arab-Israeli conflict is the refusal by Israel's enemies to accept a non-Muslim state in the Arab world, Dion responded in the Nov. 9 issue, "I think there are people of good faith on both sides who want what Canada wants: two states living in security and peace, with a contiguous border. Canada must work with these people of good faith to achieve this aim. And all our gestures and declarations must support this very important objective."

Dion had two prominent Jewish community backers in his leadership bid – businessman Stephen Bronfman and former MP and ambassador to Israel David Berger – but few Jews among his grassroots delegates.

Stéphane Dion

One was Montrealer Stanley Baker, a party activist for 30 years, who supported Dion from the outset because he felt he was the best qualified.

Gift Funds Program

TORONTO — Onex Corp. chairman and CEO Gerald Schwartz and his wife, Indigo head Heather Reisman, gave $2 million last week to Hospital for Sick Children to fund a pediatric training exchange between Israel and SickKids, the Toronto hospital said. Up to 10 Israeli pediatricians annually over five years will be named Schwartz-Reisman Fellows, with the gift paying 50 per cent of their salaries. The gift will also fund trips by 10 senior SickKids doctors or scientists to teach at Israeli hospitals or research institutes.

McGill Gets Donation

MONTREAL — Irving Ludmer, a 1957 McGill University graduate, a former Steinberg grocery chain executive and current president of holding firm Cleman Ludmer Steinberg, has given $3 million toward renovations to McGill's psychiatry building, the school said. "We're in a 43-year-old building that has hardly been touched on the inside," said department chair Dr. Joel Paris. "This will make it a more attractive building for recruits and produce a better climate for research." The gift will pay for half the $6-million project, which will take two years.

WORLD

Jews Honour Queen

LONDON — Queen Elizabeth was honoured Nov. 28 at a Jewish community event that was part of year-long celebrations of the 350th anniversary of the readmission of Jews into Britain. The Queen and Prince Philip attended a reception at St. James' Palace with more than 700 members of the Jewish community. Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks gave the Queen a menorah, and Rabbi Tony Bayfield, of the British Reform movement, gave the prince a ceremonial cup.

Anti-Semitic Acts Rise

SYDNEY — Anti-Semitic incidents are up in Australia, a report says. A study by the Executive Council of Australian Jewry that cited 442 anti-Semitic incidents from October 2005 to September 2006, an increase of 110 incidents over the same period a year earlier. Incidents spiked in July, after Israel's war with Hezbollah began, but they had already been rising before that.

School Vandalized

VIENNA — A man claiming to be Adolf Hitler is suspected of vandalizing a Vienna Jewish school. Police are holding the man, a 30-year-old Croat national, who allegedly broke into the Lauder Chabad School on Sunday, Nov. 26, and smashed windows and glass throughout the three-storey building. The president of Vienna's Jewish community called it the worst attack on a Jewish site in Austria in more than 20 years.

Get Refusers Targeted

BRUSSELS — Husbands who refuse to give their wives Jewish divorces may soon be unable to evade the rabbinate in Europe. At a meeting in Brussels this month, the Rabbinical Center of Europe is to discuss creating an organization to track such men, the Jerusalem Post reported. It would work with local Jewish courts to disperse information about them and find those who flee to avoid repercussions.

Hero Gives Birth

SEATTLE — Dayna Klein, whose defiance helped end a July 28 shooting spree at the Jewish Federation in Seattle, had a baby boy Nov 28. Klein was at work when a gunman attacked, killing a woman. Shot in the arm and five months pregnant, she crawled to her desk and dialed 911, despite the gunman's warning that he'd kill anyone who did so. She convinced him to speak to the operator and is credited with the safe release of other staff. She named her boy Charley Paz, meaning peace in Spanish, in tribute to Pam Waechter, who died in the attack.

Byelection Flyers Rattle London Jews

LONDON, Ont. — A leafletting campaign during the recent federal byelection in London-North-Centre left some of the community's Jewish residents unnerved.

Flyers left in a Jewish area were described as anti-Semitic because of a cartoon depicting Prime Minister Stephen Harper, with an oversized nose, wrapped in a flag of Israel. The flyer reproduces a message from the Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC), taken from its website, that urges local Muslims to vote Liberal and send a "message to the Harper government."

The CIC, headed by Mohamed Elmasry, said the flyer was a forgery, adding that it had nothing to do with the cartoons and that it had been the target of a smear campaign.

Alain Goldschlager, co-chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said his house and those of several Jewish neighbours, each with a mezuzah on the door, were targeted.

Faisal Joseph, head of the Association of London Muslims, said his community was "shocked that someone would link a Muslim organization to this hurtful racist commentary." He said he and other Muslim leaders condemned the incident.

Police were investigating.

Canada's inconsistent votes at UN questioned

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada's voting pattern at the United Nations on resolutions condemning Israel has some observers criticizing Ottawa for its apparent inconsistency.

Canada voted against two resolutions introduced by Islamic countries at the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) in Geneva in the middle of last week. The motions slammed Israel's policies on settlements and the Golan Heights.

At the same time in New York, Canada voted in favour of seven resolutions that were highly critical of the Jewish state while voting against two others.

Then on Friday, it split its vote on six Mideast resolutions. It opposed two bureaucratic resolutions and abstained on another, and on resolutions condemning Israeli practices, it voted with the majority – criticizing Israel on one (regarding Jerusalem), voting against another (concerning the Golan Heights) and abstaining on the last (peaceful settlement of the question of Palestine).

The inconsistency in Canada's votes was questioned by B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Coalition for Democracy (CCD) and UN Watch, though the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's primary lobbying arm on Israel, attributed the disparity to "rookie" mistakes in dealing with an overwhelming volume of anti-Israel initiatives.

In Ottawa, Foreign Affairs spokesperson Rodney Moore read a prepared statement acknowledging that Israel, as a democracy, "is deserving of our support, particularly during times of danger such as we saw last summer.

"However, we strongly support the peace process and the rule of law, and we expect both Israel and other parties in the region to do the same.

"These principles will be reflected on our votes on relevant UN resolutions, whether they take place in New York or Geneva."

Supports resolutions highly critical of Israel

In New York, Canada's UN ambassador, John McNee, called on Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) to bring peace, security and stability to their people. In an address to the General Assembly, he called for a negotiated two-state solution to the conflict. He also urged the PA to "take measures to address Israel's security concerns by controlling and preventing violence," and he said Israeli defensive steps must be exercised with restraint with an eye to avoiding civilian casualties.

However, McNee also took aim at the UN directly, saying, "Canada does not believe that all the work that is done within the UN is contributing to resolving this conflict. Resolutions on the Middle East that come before this assembly… are rarely helpful in achieving the goal we all seek – peace in the Middle East.

"Canada has criticized inflammatory and divisive language in resolutions and will not support resolutions that use emotive and provocative language in place of the plain facts."

B'nai Brith Canada responded to Canada's apparent inconsistent approach by arguing that Ottawa's votes at the General Assembly's Fourth Committee (Special Political and Decolonization) "serve[d] to bolster a UN system riddled with inherent biases against the Jewish state.

"It is contradictory on the one hand to vote in support of resolutions, which through their sheer weight and volume offer moral justification for groups like Hamas and Hezbollah to carry out their terrorist agenda, and on the other hand to stand on the world stage to oppose these same groups and expect other countries to follow Canada's lead."

Abjure all loss of hope

From the editor's desk

The diminishing light of each day that characterizes this time of year, at least for those of us in the northern hemisphere, is an eerie mirror reflecting back to the Jews of the world a darkening sense of our Jewish future.

Two items in this week's CJN depict a particularly grim portrait of the malevolent forces that have arisen against the Jewish state.

The noted Israeli commentator and scholar Ehud Ya'ari was in Toronto last week to deliver the final Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture of the season at Holy Blossom Temple.

As reported by our veteran staff writer Sheldon Kirshner in "Israel commentator delivers grim news on Mideast," Ya'ari told the large assembly that "Israel's existence is on the table once again."

According to Ya'ari, Israel's enemies are convinced that they have found an answer to western and Israeli technological and military superiority: constant and persistent warfare.

He pointed out that "Muslims who subscribe to this doctrine [of constant and persistent warfare] are neither interested in fighting over territory nor in conquering it but rather in shedding blood and prolonging the battle, even if it requires generations. The doctrine is underpinned by a 'culture of death' in which suicide bombers are praised."

Ya'ari stated categorically that Israel's most dangerous and greatest adversary today is Iran.

Echoing Ya'ari's conclusions with an an even bleaker sense of alarm is Ross Culiner in "Parting thoughts on Israel's vulnerability." It is his last column as a regular contributor since his busy schedule no longer affords him the time to write for us. But readers seeking any signs of brighter light on the immediate Jewish horizon will not necessarily find it in Culiner's column.

"Then [in 1938] as now – though the realization is painful – we may really be quite defenceless should Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad act with the same unbridled decisiveness and defiance that has marked his behaviour thus far.

"There are limits to Jewish power, even with a state of our own.

"We can only wonder whether our defence establishment, in patent disarray at the highest levels, embroiled in internal disputes, is up to the task of protecting us against the mortal threats of a scientifically sophisticated society in a vast and near land that openly declares its intent to destroy us."

Culiner concludes with the hope that the leadership needed to "inspire and galvanize" the Jewish state will quickly emerge.

Culiner is more pessimistic than fellow commentator Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, who was also in Toronto recently addressing a large assembly at Holy Blossom Temple.

Although not sugar-coating Israel's dire strategic predicament in any way, he noted that many of the Sunni Arab states in the region, Egypt and Saudi Arabia, especially, had awakened to the realization that the Shiite bloc — with Iran at the vanguard — was a greater threat to them than was Israel (as reported by Kirshner in "Israeli leaders not up to Iranian threat: analyst," Toronto issue, Nov. 23). Klein Halevi concluded by sharing the belief that just as Nazism and communism were defeated, so too will be the forces of Islamic radicalism.

Ya'ari, Culiner, and Klein Halevi are astute observers and chroniclers of life in the Middle East. There is no denying the hard truths they have described. Though what they say is alarming, they are not being alarmists. They are, in the purest sense of the word, sounding an alarm, warning of impending danger. In ancient times, it would have been akin to ascending the nearby hilltops to sound the shofar summoning the people to collective response.

Each one of us who believes in the shared destiny of the Jewish people has a duty to join in that response. In point of irrefutable fact, that duty falls on each one of us who believes in the sanctity of life and in the abiding humanity of western values.

But how to respond? What is the counter-strategy?

"Despair," to quote Rabbi David Hartman of Jerusalem, "is not an option." For the sake of our children who seek their example and sometimes perhaps even their inspiration from their parents and teachers, it is absolutely imperative that we abjure all behaviours connected to loss of hope.

But it is also imperative for our own sakes. For we are the ones fighting, wherever we live, on behalf of Jewish destiny. And our commitment to that destiny must never abate.

We must try to ignite within us a spirit of activism. We can no longer afford to be bystanders in the unfolding of Jewish history.

In very broad terms, the strategy is twofold. First, despite the frustration, we must constantly try to influence events on the macro level by directly lobbying and/or supporting groups that lobby governmental and non-governmental organizations.

Second, at the micro level, the level of our personal lives, we must no longer hug the shoreline of our Jewish identities but rather, we must swim in its open seas. To follow the dictum of Martin Lockshin, a professor at York University, we must "do more Jewish things."

Jewish history has taught us ways of coping with days of diminishing light. The essence of the essence, however, is not to lose hope. I will elaborate on this next week.

Ceasefire could revive peace talks: Peace Now

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel should use the recently proclaimed ceasefire in the Gaza Strip to restart the peace process with the Palestinians, says Yariv Oppenheimer, general director of Peace Now.

Although he fears the truce will not endure, Oppenheimer nevertheless regards it as an opportunity for both sides to move away from the present cycle of violence.

"My bet is that this ceasefire won't last for more than a month or two, and that we'll be back to square one," he said in an interview last week.

Previous ceasefires have come and gone, he noted somberly. "But I hope I'm wrong about this one. You never know in the Middle East. Yet I have to say that this is a very fragile truce."

Here at the invitation of Hillel and Canadian Friends of Peace Now, Oppenheimer was in Canada on his first-ever visit. Apart from Toronto, he was scheduled to stop in Montreal and Ottawa before proceeding to the United States.

Oppenheimer, 30, drew encouragement from Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's recent statement in which he voiced a willingness to give up large swaths of the West Bank and ease the system of checkpoints there in exchange for what he described as "real peace" with the Palestinians.

"It's a positive statement, but it's not a policy yet," he said. "It's too early to say whether it's a significant step or just public relations."

Until the ceasefire was announced, Oppenheimer was "disappointed " by Olmert's performance. He rejected a peace plan jointly presented by Spain, France and Italy, and he rebuffed overtures by Syria.

But now that he wants to engage the Palestinians in negotiations, Olmert should open a direct channel to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, agree to free Palestinian prisoners so that captured Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit can be released and end the siege of the Gaza Strip, Oppenheimer said.

A peace process that brings economic benefits to Palestinians at large could well induce militants in the Gaza Strip to stop firing Qassam rockets into Israel, he said, adding that a resolution of the Palestinian problem will prevent Iran from exploiting it for its own ends throughout the Arab world.

Israel's policy of targeting Palestinian militants for assassination may save Jewish lives in the short run, he said. But over the longer term, this policy will be counterproductive and produce still more radical Palestinians.

Taking issue with the conventional wisdom in Israel that Abbas is too weak and ineffective to be a reliable partner, Oppenheimer argued that he is is, in fact, a suitable interlocutor. "Abbas is the most moderate Palestinian leader we can imagine," he said, urging Israel to strengthen him by offering the Palestinians tangible concessions.

"You have to give the Palestinians a feeling that political progress is possible," he said, citing as an example the creation of a Palestinian state with provisional borders.

'The Palestinians aren't prepared to compromise on the refugee problem, and Israel is not ready for a division of Jerusalem'
—Yariv Oppenheimer

Beyond this, neither Israel nor the Palestinians have reached the point where final status talks can begin, observed Oppenheimer, who has been Peace Now's general director for the past four years.

"The Palestinians aren't prepared to compromise on the refugee problem, and Israel is not ready for a division of Jerusalem."

Oppenheimer is not partial to any particular peace plan. "We're not in love with any single plan, but we'll support any two-state initiative."

In the face of the continuing radicalization of the Muslim world, he is convinced that Israel must forge lasting and effective relationships with moderate Arab states and Palestinian figures and then pursue peace with them.

As he puts it in an essay: "Only with such policies can we sideline radical Islam and ensure a secure future for Israel. The continuation of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict only plays into the hands of the radicals and weakens the Israeli army and Israel's legitimacy in the eyes of the world."

In his view, Israel should negotiate with Hamas if it accepts a two-state solution and drops two major demands: a prior Israeli withdrawal from the territories and the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

Oppenheimer said that no Palestinian leader, even Abbas, would countenance Olmert's plan to retain 10 per cent of the West Bank, with its major settlement blocs, unless Israel is willing to make an equitable land swap.

"We'll have to go back, more or less, to the pre-1967 lines. Israel created this precedent in the peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan and in the unilateral disengagement from the Gaza Strip."

As for the Palestinian refugees, they should be resettled in a future Palestinian state, he noted.

"We support the idea of a security fence if it is built along Israel's [current] border, but we have problems with its route through the West Bank. Israel is trying to use the fence to steal land from the Palestinians."

Oppenheimer said that Israeli settlements in the West Bank are a clear obstacle to peace. "Without them, we could have had a two-state solution decades ago."

The settlements will destroy the "Zionist dream," declared Oppenheimer, whose organization recently released information to the media claiming that almost 40 per cent of the settlements in the West Bank are situated on land privately owned by Palestinians.

Alluding to demographic concerns, he said that Israel will be doomed to a twilight existence if it keeps the settlements. "We won't be a Jewish state or a democratic state. We'll lose our ability to protect ourselves. We'll have to keep fighting the Muslim world. We'll be internationally isolated. Altogether, the settlements don't make much sense."

He assumes that Olmert will dismantle unauthorized outposts in the West Bank should there be a peace agreement with the Palestinians. He expressed surprise that Olmert's predecessor, Ariel Sharon, didn't take down these outposts when he abandoned the Gaza settlements in 2005.

Asked whether Israel should accept Syria's offer for a resumption of bilateral peace negotiations, Oppenheimer replied, "Let's talk. Maybe Syria is serious. Let's embrace this opportunity."

Oppenheimer cautioned Israel not to unilaterally attack Iran's nuclear facilities. Israel should quietly push the international community to take action against Iran, whether through sanctions or military force.

UJA Federation reaches out to Israelis in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Galya Sarner says her own marriage is a good example of how Israelis and Canadian-born Jews can enrich each other's lives.

Israeli Forum to fight prejudice

please see page 18

The 44-year-old Jerusalem native, whose husband, Robert, was born and raised in Toronto, has been working for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto since September 2005, doing outreach to the local Israeli community.

As strategic community planner for the federation's Israeli community project, Sarner – whose master's thesis focused on how Russian olim adjust to life in Israel – has worked on developing "a strategy to bring the Israeli community closer to the [greater] Jewish community."

There's "obviously a gap" between the Israeli community in Toronto and the rest of the Jewish community here, Sarner admits. "Otherwise, I wouldn't be here."

She doesn't feel the gap is "that deep, but maybe I'm an optimistic person." Progress has been made, she said, but "there is still a lot of work to do."

David Gidron – former director of the Israeli House, part of the Israeli Consulate in Toronto, before he returned to Israel this summer – told The CJN before he left that the federation initiative is "a big step. For the first time, there's a sense of dialogue and openness.

"I think you would say there's definitely an improvement. But there's still a large part of the community that's skeptical.

"I think the federation has these boxes it's used to working with. If you fit in, everything is wonderful – existing youth movements, denominations, schools. The Israeli community is a bit different because it's [largely] secular. Only part is in the Jewish schools."

Gidron said what unites Israelis "is the great pride of being Israeli, and a very deep relationship with Israel that is very different than that of any Canadian Jew, no matter how much he loves Israel."

But based on interviews last year with "hundreds" of Toronto Israelis, Sarner said they do want to be part of the "Canadian" community. However, they feel "very much excluded."

Reflecting what may be a recent change in Israelis' attitude toward the federation, the "Israeli" campaign – part of the federation's Israel emergency campaign this summer – raised $160,000 in one day, more than quadrupling her expectations, Sarner said.

Also, the Israeli Forum (see accompanying article), a group of 10 high-profile businessmen headed by Gil Blutrich, officially became part of UJA Federation in late October. Sarner was instrumental in bringing the mostly Israeli group together late last year, in part to address the apparent lack of a "solid leader that would bring together the Israeli community [in Toronto]."

While much of Sarner's role focuses on bringing Israelis into the federation fold and "meeting their cultural needs" with programs in Hebrew, the idea behind the Israeli Forum, she said, was also to bring the Israeli community closer to the "Canadian" community. "Its vision is to serve the Israeli Canadian community, but to be part of UJA."

Galya Sarner

How much of her job has to do with fundraising? She is a fundraiser, she said, and she is becoming "more and more proud of it.

"I understand that without money, nothing would happen here," she said, referring to cultural events and issues like the building and running of schools and synagogues.

Sarner said the time has also come for the Israeli Canadian community to stand behind the idea that money makes things happen.

Cultural events such as a recent movie screening, and the opening of a new Hebrew-language Sunday school are also part of the federation's outreach.

The screening of Avi Avi – a Hebrew-language film directed by Israeli Canadian Avi Lev that tells the story of two Israeli immigrants here – together with an art exhibit of paintings done for the film and an English-language panel discussion after the screening provided "a beautiful integration of the Israeli and non-Israeli communities," Sarner said, adding that more than 300 people attended.

Kachol-Lavan, the new Hebrew-language Sunday school, teaches about Israeli tradition and would welcome non-Israeli students, Sarner said. In terms of integration with non-Israelis, she said it's "only the beginning. Every day we try to add another layer.

"The second part of [our] vision is that we would like to be a strong [integrated] community."

Toronto has one of the largest Israeli Diaspora communities in the world, according to federation spokesperson Howard English.

There are more than 32,000 Israelis in Toronto, not including younger community members who were born here but consider themselves Israeli, Sarner added.

"We felt there [would be] an enormous amount of benefit both to the Israeli Canadian community, the rest of the [Jewish] community and the federation, by helping make sure the Israeli Canadian community was more integrated," English said.

Sow the wind, reap the whirlwind

Iran is now more brazenly trying to bring about a change in Lebanon's governing regime. Its well-armed, fanatic Shia surrogate in south Lebanon, Hezbollah, has demanded that Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and his government resign. To bring this about, the group staged a massive anti-government rally last week in the very courtyard of the Beirut parliament, vowing not to surrender the town square until the government falls. Indeed, at this writing, more than two days after the rally, hundreds of Hezbollah-led, anti-government demonstrators are still encamped on the streets calling for Siniora's ouster.

Syria, Iran's ally in the campaign of fomenting terror against Israel and instability against broader western interests in the region, also supports Hezbollah's call for Siniora's overthrow. No wonder. The Assad rulers in Damascus are widely believed to have been responsible for the killing of staunchly pro-Lebanese sovereigntists Rafik Hariri earlier this year and Pierre Gemayel just last month. They are trying to prevent the Lebanese government from finding the culprits in those murders. Indeed, six Hezbollah cabinet ministers quit the government some weeks ago to try to undermine the creation of a special tribunal to investigate the Hariri killing.

The fall of Siniora's government would permanently derail the investigation into the Hariri and Gemayel murders, and the resulting anarchy would certainly forestall, if not prevent, the delivery of hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign aid that European countries have promised for the rebuilding of Lebanon. The withholding of reconstruction funds would further serve the interests of Hezbollah and Iran.

Siniora immediately accused Hezbollah last week of trying to instigate a coup. In response, he deployed the army in a security cordon around government buildings.

We doubt however, that he was surprised. He knew very well the true, thuggish nature of his Hezbollah co-legislators. They held the entire country hostage last summer when they launched their war against Israel. Siniora is paying the price now for having some months ago surrendered Lebanon's sovereignty to Hezbollah.

Having sown Hezbollah's hot eastern wind of fanaticism and gangsterism, he is now reaping its dire and dangerous whirlwind.

The situation is extremely tense. Jerusalem, Washington and Europe are carefully monitoring developments. But so, too, are Cairo, Amman and Riyadh. King Abdullah of Jordan, the Saudi monarch Abdullah and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak have all expressed support for the Siniora government and warned of the chaos that would ensue if the putative Iranian and Syrian-sponsored putschers were to prevail. They fear the encroachment of triumphalist, Shiite Iran. So should we all.

Election date conflicts with holiday (1)

Before the provincial election next fall, there will be at least two weeks during which citizens can vote at a riding election office ("Ont. election date conflicts with Shemini Atzeret," CJN, Nov. 30). There will also be four or five days before the election when they can go to a community centre closer to home to vote as well. While it is true that observant Jews will not be able to work on election day, there is no reason not to support candidates, campaign or even vote, if we look at the election the way it truly is, several days of voting and not a single eight-hour event.

Election date conflicts with holiday (2)

It is outrageous that the Ontario government has set a date for the 2007 provincial election that coincides with a major Jewish holiday. Advance polls won't fix the problem, since they are less convenient, and less well known, so inevitably many, if not most, affected people will end up not voting. And voting is not the only issue. In a democracy, the ability to work on election day to "get the vote out" is a crucial right.

Applauds Harper, MacKay on Israel

As a Canadian Jew living in Israel, I applaud both Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Foreign Minister Peter MacKay for their consistent position in support of Israel's self-defence in the face of the many external threats it faces ("Harper's pro-Israel position sparks a debate," Kirshner File, CJN, Nov. 16). That they have not wavered in light of domestic and international pressure to change their approach is a testimony to principle over expediency in political life.

While I can appreciate the view of one of your correspondents ("Vote Conservative?" Toronto letters, CJN, Nov. 16) that Canadian Jews as voters must take into account many issues, committed Jews confront a real dilemma in elections when the stakes for Israel are as high as they are today. That prominent Canadian Jewish politicians and business leaders who are Liberals have stepped forward to support a Conservative prime minister for his position on Israel indicates their recognition that Israel today faces threats to its very existence of an unprecedented nature.

Missing Yemenite babies

Although Rabbi Yehiel Ben Ayon does not accept the explanation offered by the State of Israel as to the missing Yemenite babies –"But the claim that hundreds died is impossible," he writes – he allows Israel to shirk its responsibility in correcting this terrible injustice ("The lost children of Yemen – Pt. 2," CJN, Nov. 23). He also writes: "The whole truth of this episode will remain a mystery."

With today's technology and scientific know-how, it should be quite simple for all willing and interested Yemenite people who suspect they were victimized more than 50 years ago to enter their DNA information into a central data bank that would cross-reference for familial match. Parents and children and siblings could, and would, be reunited.

Crucial details missing

The anti-Israel rallies at York University and the University of Toronto are becoming all too frequent and very alarming. What is more alarming, however, is the lack of crucial details that were missing in your article ("Anti-Israel activists rally at York, U of T", CJN, Nov. 23).

I wish to point out that York's newest group, Network, headed by Mike Khardas, did all of the leg work to get students to stand up to the anti-Israel propaganda.

Hardworking organizations such as Hagshama and Aish Campus are making incredible contributions to campus and very often get overlooked.

Israel: a brand we can be proud of

By LARRY WEINBERG

In the summer of 2003, former prime minister Ariel Sharon told Newsweek magazine: "Because of the conflict, we [Israelis] often have a gun in our hand, and the world cannot see the fields in which we lead and the good things we do."

This observation begs two questions: if Israel holds a gun in one hand, what does she do with her other hand, and why doesn't the world see that hand as well? This creates a useful metaphor to use in exploring whether or not Israel should "brand" itself.

Sad and true is the fact that Israelis must be vigilant about security – it is necessary for many to bear arms every day. Yet, it is also true that each day, many more Israelis do other things, things that add value to life around the world. They conduct research into diseases and create medicines and devices to better treat those diseases. They create art, films, literature and music that make the world more beautiful. They invent technologies that make the world safer, businesses more efficient and life a bit easier. They raise families that love and celebrate life. Every day, Israelis use one hand for defence and the other to make the world a better place.

And yet, as Sharon noted, this goes unseen by the world.

The Jerusalem Post reported that the Foreign Ministry recently convened a group of marketing professionals – largely volunteers – to brainstorm and discuss Israel's brand in the world.

Israel, like every entity, company, product or nation, has a brand. The question considered was what Israelis should do to better manage theirs. Some critics and some media have used the term "makeover" to describe the branding process, but it is neither correct nor fair.

"A brand is a promise; a good brand is a promise kept," noted one expert who spoke. What then are the promises Israel and her people make to the world, and are they kept? Well, Israel promises that it will defend its people, its sovereignty and its existence as a democratic Jewish state, no matter what. The history of the past 58 years shows how well this promise has been kept at the cost of many brave lives, and research on Israel's brand shows how completely this reality has shaped Israel's current brand in the world.

But is security the only thing about Israelis the world should see or know? The question for the branding group, myself among them, became, "What else can Israelis promise – and deliver on – to show the world who they are?"

The answer is found in the essence of who Israelis are and what kind of society they create, and that is what the essence of Israel's brand must be. It must include the reality of the security issues of course, the hand already seen. But the reality of what Israel is in the 21st century can only be shown through the work of the other hand, the one it uses to be a valuable member of the world community each day, and through the lives led by Israelis each day.

So the branding work group started a process that can be completed by ordinary Israelis only when they embrace a vision and make the promises that will complete Israel's brand. Claims in the press that the brand will show Israel to be a fun, libertine paradise blissfully unaware or unaffected by the rigours of the conflict are at best oversimplifications and at worst determined misinformation.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni's admirable desire to close the gap between world perceptions of Israel and the reality of Israel is as legitimate a purpose as defence of the nation's security measures or the pursuit of political justice. The branding process doesn't pre-empt or replace these efforts, it augments them. It asks the world to know Israelis by the full scope of their society.

Some believe Israel is best served by focusing attention on the evils of her enemies. Elections are sometimes won by negative campaigns, but in the long term, respect and affinity – what marketers refer to as brand equity – can only be earned by focusing on the positive. With Israelis creating so much value for so many, there is much that is positive to focus on and great potential for success.

Ariel Sharon was only partly right: the world sees the gun because that's the only Israeli hand that is seen. It's time for Israelis to hold that other hand up high – the one that makes the world a better place, the one that creates a vibrant society and celebrates life, the one that embraces all colours and creeds. And while they're at it, Israelis ought to hold their heads high, too. They have a lot to be proud of. It's time to tell the world.

Research will lead to early diagnosis of cancer

By DAVID BRINN

As a child growing up in the mixed Jewish-Arab Israeli city of Nazareth, Hossam Haick loved to do puzzles.

"One puzzle leads to a solution, but often the solution leads to another puzzle," says the 31-year-old faculty member of the Technion school of chemical engineering.

"In science, as in childhood, there are a lot of puzzles. Studying for my bachelor's degree at Ben-Gurion University, I began to think more about puzzles in science and found that it attracted me," he says, explaining why he chose a career in science.

Now, his research could one day result in a novel cancer treatment breakthrough. The European Union recently awarded Haick the Marie Curie Action excellence grant totalling $2.2 million (US), for the development of an artificial olfactory system (an electronic nose) that can sniff out cancer.

Israeli scientist Hossam Haick is seen in his laboratory.

"I'm really pleased to have received the grant – it's very prestigious. We submitted a proposal back in January, and only a couple of weeks ago, received a message about winning the grant," Haick says.

"There's a great deal of satisfaction, but there's also the challenge ahead of continuing in the right direction and developing our ideas for the project in the most effective manner."

Haick's proposal was for a program to develop an electronic device based on nanometer-sized sensors that will become an artificial olfactory system that can detect cancer from the breath of the patient.

"You simply exhale on the instrument, and it will tell if the person is healthy or has cancer. It can also distinguish between types of cancer, and most importantly, at which stage the cancer has developed," says Haick, adding that in its initial stage, the electronic nose is intended to sniff out and diagnose lung cancer which afflicts millions of Americans.

"In our research, we already showed that, using nanosensors, it is possible to differentiate between a healthy human being and one with cancer. The challenge for us and for the project is to differentiate between the different stages of the disease."

The diagnosis can be carried out at a very early stage even before a tumour has formed, Haick says. Treatment will then be immediate and will destroy the disease at its inception.

"Most imaging techniques are limited in their detection ability by the size of the tumour. If it's less than a specific size, then it won't be detected. In our technology, we can detect cancer from the breath at the very early stages before the tumour has even formed. This can increase the survival rate by four or five times. It's very significant," he says.

> 'Israeli science is very developed and well known'

No stranger to the technology surrounding electronic noses, Haick, who completed his PhD at the Technion, recently spent two years as a senior lecturer at the California Institute of Technology (Caltech). His area of research there was in electronic instruments based on nanomaterials and electronic noses.

"The group that I worked with developed electronic noses and devices for the NASA space shuttle, so I received some good training," says Haick. The fact that he came from Israel was considered a plus by his colleagues at Caltech.

"Israeli science is very developed and well known… we're respected within the science community throughout the world."

Haick will be using that respect to recruit a dozen researchers from abroad and Israel to join his team. With the grant and additional funds he received from the Technion through the Russell Berrie Nanotechnology Institute, he is setting up a laboratory that will include equipment valued at more than $1 million.

"Before I received the grant, I had already set up my own lab on campus through the Russell Berrie Foundations and supported by the Technion. But now with the grant, I can develop the lab more and get more essential equipment, and it will enable me to hire researchers, both from Israel and from outside the country. One of the clauses in the grant is to form an 'excellence team' consisting of researchers not only from Israel but also from the European Commission," he explains.

At the end of the four-year project, Haick hopes his team will reach their goal of developing a cancer-sniffing device that can be commercialized.

Haick lives in Haifa near the Technion with his wife, a chemist with a degree in food and biotechnological engineering who works with the Israeli Ministry of Health. During last summer's war in the north, the couple decided to stay in their apartment.

"During the war it wasn't easy. And although the political situation wasn't promising, I continued to go to the Technion every day and work on science. We didn't leave the city, or our home."

Haick looks back at his puzzle-filled childhood with a mixture of wonder and fulfilment that it has led to such recognition in the science world.

"I gradually entered that loop of puzzle-solution, puzzle-solution and I've never gotten out. So, I'm still practising my hobby and I'm also making science which is benefiting the world."

David Brinn is editorial director of ISRAEL21c.

Opinions

Inhuman shields

The deployment of civilians to protect combatants is not a new phenomenon. Seen during hostilities in such places as Algeria, Serbia, and Iraq, and evident as well during the Palestinian intifadah and the war in Lebanon, this abominable tactic has more recently been used to thwart Israel's fight against terrorism in Gaza.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

We'll recall that in early November, following an appeal broadcast on Hamas radio, scores of women rushed to a mosque in the town of Beit Hanoun, where Palestinian gunmen were in the midst of a standoff with the Israel Defence Forces. As a result of their interference, all the terrorists were able to escape, many disguised in robes provided by their "rescuers."

Then, later in November, Mohammed Baroud, who heads a group called the Popular Resistance Committee and who is known to co-ordinate rocket attacks on Israel, was able to attract hundreds of local Palestinian supporters to his home in northern Gaza, just before the structure was to be demolished by the IDF. To avoid civilian casualties, the planned airstrike was cancelled.

Gathering on rooftops and balconies and in the streets below, protesters chanting "Death to Israel, death to America," trumpeted their "victory" and vowed to repeat their collective expression of defiance against Israel. Palestinian Prime Minister, Ismail Haniyeh, in a personal appearance at Baroud's residence, praised the action and those who participated in it.

A few hours later, a second shield preempted a similarly planned strike on the home of Hamas operative Mohammed Nawajeh.

But in what has been considered by some as an uncharacteristically blunt rebuke, the New York-based Human Rights Watch (HRW) declared that the Palestinians' endorsement of human shields is a clear violation of international humanitarian law.

"There is no excuse for calling civilians to the scene of a planned attack", said Sarah Whitson, HRW's Middle East director. "Whether or not the home is a legitimate military target, knowingly asking civilians to stand in harm's way is unlawful".

Not surprisingly, there are differing opinions regarding civilians who become embedded in theatres of armed conflict, either voluntarily or forcibly. Some believe that no matter what the circumstance, such interveners are to be regarded as non-combatants and are thereby immune from attack. Others argue that there must be a clear distinction between those who are coerced versus those who willingly assume their role. It could be contended that the latter, acting as no less than terrorist helpers, do not deserve to be protected.

Regardless of whether or not the latest ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinians holds, the moral issues that face the IDF on how to deal with human shields warrant serious re-examination – and sooner rather than later.

Parting thoughts on Israel's vulnerability

As I write this, my final monthly CJN column, 2½ years after penning my first, I look back and realize, to my great sorrow, that what I began in the nightmare days of suicide bombings, I am rounding off as the nightmare scenario of an even greater threat to Israel and Israelis, a nuclear one, looms on the horizon.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

Back in 2004, I was convinced that I had experienced the worst of days in this country, extremes of barbarity that I was unlikely to encounter again in this lifetime.

I was, it now seems, naïve. I'd forgotten that in the Middle East, there are no limits to how far people will descend into savagery. And as the instruments of murder and destruction increase in ferocity, in this instance taking on a doomsday dimension, there is scarce little that will inhibit certain ideological fanatics in our neighbourhood from seriously contemplating how best to employ them in realizing demonic objectives – obliterating other countries not excepted.

No longer does one hear vague and cautious scholarly assessments about a potential future threat from Iran some years down the line. Rather, the talk is of a few months down the line, and the tone is marked by stridency and urgency. For when a soon-to-be nuclear dictatorship openly vows genocide of the Jewish people, that Jewish people had better take care. But how, exactly?

Oh yes, it's nice to know, as was recently made clear, that the American president would be most understanding if our country was to launch a pre-emptive attack against Iran. But when someone is perfectly understanding of others doing something, it generally means they have no intention of doing it themselves. In light of the troubles in Iraq these days, that makes complete sense. But if George W. Bush won't help us, who in heaven will? Israel is a midget confronting a sprawling giant, and Iran's nuclear program is no Osirak reactor, which was a one-shot affair.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, in a speech to the recent UJC General Assembly in Los Angeles, drew analogies to Munich in 1938 while describing the present paralysis and short-sightedness of the western nations in dealing with this crisis. Indeed, then as now, the Jews, it appears, are in the sights of a malevolent and tyrannical power while the world stands by and watches. Then, as now – though the realization is painful – we may really be quite defenceless should Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad act with the same unbridled decisiveness and defiance that has marked his behaviour thus far.

Yes, defenceless. There are limits to Jewish power, even with a state of our own. A tiny, compact nation in which most people live crowded together offers easy pickings. Need we be reminded that a short four months ago, quite aware of Israel's inherent vulnerability, an organized collection of thugs in southern Lebanon armed with giant firecrackers stashed in underground holes held our country hostage for weeks while our vaunted military hemmed and hawed ineffectively? In light of that "awakening," we can only wonder whether our defence establishment, in patent disarray at the highest levels, embroiled in internal disputes, is up to the task of protecting us against the mortal threats of a scientifically sophisticated society in a vast and near land that openly declares its intent to destroy us.

Don't kid yourselves. This is no Entebbe, or even a Six Day War. The glory days of little David ingeniously battling the dark forces of evil with deftness and cunning are a thing of the romantic past. The powers of evil have taken on a combination of unlikely qualities: at once cataclysmic in their proportions, yet as evasive as phantoms. They are highly motivated, technologically astute and much emboldened as America founders in Iraq and "mighty" Israel wallows in internal weakness, scandal, corruption and loss of heart after a bungled operation in Lebanon.

Meanwhile, the Qassams rain down on us, the Gaza disengagement has proven a disaster and Palestinian society is on the brink of implosion and explosion.

Sadly, my period with The CJN began and ends with existential threats – some from within, some from without.

In desperate need of leadership – leadership that can inspire and galvanize us for mortal combat – we look about in vain.

Preparing for the post-Bush era

The sweeping Democratic victory in the recent U.S. congressional elections signals a major shift in American policy, particularly with respect to Iraq. After six years of uncontested neo-conservative leadership, in both the White House and Congress, U.S. voters expressed dissatisfaction with the results, in no uncertain terms. And President George W. Bush acknowledged that the effort to bring democracy to the Middle East, beginning with Baghdad, is not going well.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

As a result, Israeli policymakers must also prepare for the coming changes in U.S. policy. In 2001, Israelis were concerned that Bush would resume his father's close cooperation with Arab oil producers and squeeze Israel in the search for an unrealistic peace agreement with the Palestinians and Syria.

But this administration recognized that the failure of peace efforts was due to Palestinian rejectionism and weakness in the face of terror, and in 2002, Bush broke off all ties with then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat. Similarly, the invasion of Iraq and the toppling of Saddam Hussein signalled a new level of U.S. involvement in the opposition to extremist Arab dictators. For Israelis, it appeared that the Americans finally understood regional realities.

However, the faith in democracy was overdone, and the United States failed to come up with a workable post-invasion strategy. As the violence and chaos in Iraq increased, Iran's power as a regional superpower also grew. In the process, the United States lost the leverage that might have forced Tehran to give up, or at least postpone, its nuclear weapons efforts, and Israeli deterrence was also weakened. The need for a different approach was clear.

Ironically, the political defeat for the Bush administration may revive America's will and force the development of a more successful strategy for Iraq. The Democratic critics of the previous policies may realize that they can't simply withdraw and pretend that Islamist violence and terror will disappear – precisely the opposite can be expected from a precipitous exit of U.S. forces. A new consensus-based American policy, based on containment of the radical forces in both Iraq and Iran, rather than efforts to impose stability through a large military presence, could lead to a revived deterrent capability, particularly vis-à-vis the Iranian leadership.

At the same time, the Americans – Congress and the White House together – will also need to devise and implement a realistic approach to Syria and Lebanon.

Bush and his advisers isolated and denounced the Syrian leadership under Bashar Assad for involvement in assassinations in Lebanon and in promoting Iraqi terror. However, a new commission appointed by Bush and led by James Baker (secretary of state under the previous Bush administration and a well-known Arabist) appears to be ready to do business again with the Syrians.

Damascus has taken advantage of its newfound influence in Washington, renewing assassinations in Beirut. The confused signals from Washington have already done considerable damage and must be replaced with a consistent approach.

The six years of the Bush administration have also demonstrated the limits of the unilateral application of American power and principle. With numerous threats around the world – from North Korea to Iran – U.S. policymakers now realize that they depend on co-operation from the other major powers, including Europe, China and Russia. As in the past, Israel will probably be forced to pay a price in this process, particularly when Europe becomes involved.

In facing these challenges, the return of the policies that were dominant during the Clinton era, based on empty rhetoric not backed by force, would further encourage radical Islamist triumphalism. If the Democratic leadership in Congress promotes the type of toothless internationalism based on the illusion of a serious role for the United Nations, the results for the United States, Israel and the West will be disastrous.

The most important test is not in Iraq, but rather the Iranian effort to achieve nuclear weapons. Unless the Americans – Republicans and Democrats together – can develop a realistic policy and enlist the cooperation of the other major powers, Israel will have to be prepared to confront Iran on its own.

The Kirshner File

The unintended consequences of democracy

Shortly after 19 Arab hijackers affiliated with Al Qaeda launched co-ordinated attacks in the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration declared war on the forces of international terrorism.

In short order, the United States invaded Afghanistan to crush the Islamic fundamentalist Taliban regime that had aided and abetted Al Qaeda. Washington, however, quickly realized that terrorism could not be combated by military means alone. It was understood that the underlying causes of terrorism in the Arab world, from poverty to residual rage over the legacy of western colonialism, had to be addressed.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Seizing on democratization as a panacea for the various ills and discontents that plague the region, and mindful of the fact that totalitarian Japan and Germany had been led out of the darkness by a systematic program of democratic reforms, Washington concluded that Jeffersonian democracy could be applied to the Middle East. Although it is a region awash in autocracy, the United States saw no reason why the trappings of liberal democracy – free elections, an independent judiciary, an unfettered press, transparent institutions designed to serve the public good – could not be transferred to the Middle East.

To officials in the Bush administration who devised this doctrine, democracy – the highest form of universal governance – was suitable for all societies, regardless of their political, cultural, religious or historical backgrounds, and could be used to combat Islamic terrorism, a new strategic threat to the United States and its allies in the Middle East.

Convinced that the infusion of democracy into the Middle East would be of benefit to all, U.S. President George W. Bush announced an old, new doctrine that has come to define his administration.

In a speech he delivered in London on Nov. 19, 2003, only eight months after the allied invasion of Iraq, Bush said: "Democracy, and the hope and progress it brings, are the alternatives to instability and to hatred and terror. We cannot rely exclusively on military power to assure our long-term security. Lasting peace is gained as justice and democracy advance… And democratic governments do not shelter terrorist camps."

Acknowledging that Washington's approach to the region was outdated, Bush declared, "We must shake off decades of failed policy in the Middle East. We have been willing to make a bargain to tolerate oppression for the sake of stability. Longstanding ties often led us to overlook the faults of local elites. Yet this bargain did not bring stability or make us safe. It merely bought time while problems festered and ideologies of violence took hold."

Building on this theme, Bush promised to allocate considerable funds to promote democracy. He had reason to assume that Arabs might be receptive to his upbeat message. With the demise of communism in the Soviet Union and eastern Europe, a minority of Arab intellectuals, academics and journalists in such countries as Egypt and Syria had been emboldened to sing the praises of democracy.

Since then, Bush's secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, has constantly harped on the theme. Last year, in a blunt challenge to U.S. Arab allies, she called on Egypt and Saudi Arabia to embrace democracy, release political prisoners and allow free expression and rights for women.

Like Bush, she admitted that American Mideast policy had been self-serving and short-sighted. As he put it at the American University in Cairo, "For 60 years, [we] pursued stability at the expense of democracy in this region. Now we are taking a different course. We are supporting the democratic aspirations of all people."

Although Bush remains committed to the idea of bringing democracy to the Middle East, particularly in Iraq, where the United States is mired in what seems like an unwinnable insurgency, he now probably realizes that it could be inimical to the interests of the United States and its regional allies.

But in promoting the flowering of democracy, Bush supported fair and clean elections in the Palestinian autonomous areas, Lebanon, Egypt and Iraq. Ironically, though, the primary effect of these elections was to empower Islamic parties that oppose the American presence in the Middle East, virtually all forms of Western influence and Israel's existence.

In the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Hamas – the Islamic Resistance Movement – swept Fatah out of office by a wide margin and thereby set back the chances of a negotiated settlement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. Hamas, whose charter clearly calls for Israel's destruction, refuses to accede to widespread demands to recognize the Jewish state, renounce terrorism and accept previous agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority and Israel. As a result, Israel has severed links with the Palestinian Authority, international donors have cut off the flow of much-needed aid to the Palestinians and Hamas has been unable to pay the salaries of 160,000 government employees.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice

These turns of events have produced a humanitarian crisis and further unrest and chaos and possibly set the stage for an armed showdown between Hamas and Fatah, which could yet touch off a civil war. Given the absence of any real authority in Gaza, Palestinian radicals fired Qassam rockets into Israel. In the face of these brazen attacks, and in light of last summer's war in Lebanon, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert shelved plans for a unilateral withdrawal from parts of the West Bank. This is not what Bush had in mind when he talked about the virtues of Arab-style democracy. But thanks to a new though brittle truce in Gaza, the situation may improve.

In Lebanon, elections have benefited Hezbollah, which is backed by two anti-American powers, Iran and Syria. Buoyed by its electoral gains and by arms shipments from Tehran and Damascus, Hezbollah foolhardily provoked Israel into launching a war in Lebanon. The war has strengthened Hezbollah, shaken the pro-western government in Beirut and enhanced Iran's status in Lebanon. On the heels of these developments and the assassination of Christian Maronite cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel two weeks ago, Hezbollah is jockeying for yet more power.

In Egypt, what passes for elections brought the Muslim Brotherhood additional gains. President Hosni Mubarak's National Democratic party won in a landslide yet again, but observers speculated that the Muslim Brotherhood would have emerged triumphant had the elections not been rigged.

Egyptians are tired of Mubarak's authoritarian rule, his lip service to democracy and his intolerance of serious political opponents such as Ayman Nour, who was imprisoned for five years for supposedly falsifying petitions to get himself on the ballot. They are also fed up with glaring economic imbalances, which condemn many to penury and uplift a few to wealth.

But if Mubarak were to be deposed in an Islamic coup, Egypt might repudiate its peace treaty with Israel, distance itself from the West, draw close to Iran and transform Egypt into a society governed by sharia law.

Mubarak, a former air force general who succeeded Anwar Sadat in 1981, believes that the Bush administration's vision of a New Middle East through democracy is naive at best and dangerous at worst.

Several months ago, in a stinging critique, he advised Bush to focus instead on the festering Arab-Israeli conflict. "The failure and stopping of the peace process is the essence of the problem in the Middle East," he said. "The time has come for international powers to recognize this fact and to deal with it…"

The advent of democracy in Iraq would be a wonderful thing after years of brutal Baathist misrule. But in the last Iraqi election a year ago, the fruits of democracy yielded a bitter taste. It solidified savage sectarian divisions and led to the formation of a Shiite-dominated government, whose leaders have been weaned on rigid Islamic principles and may yet fall under the tantalizing sway of Iran.

The dissemination of democratic values among the Arabs should theoretically be good for Israel, as former Israeli cabinet minister and Refusenik Natan Sharansky states in The Case for Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror and as Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, said recently.

But the sad truth is that democracy may elevate and legitimize politicians who will try to sweep away secular institutions, demonize Israel and the West and destabilize the region.

The unintended consequences of democracy in the Arab world may be too awful to even contemplate, much less live with.

Israel commentator delivers grim news on Mideast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The strategic environment in the Middle East for Israel has changed to its disadvantage, says Ehud Ya'ari, one of Israel's leading pundits and lecturers.

In a grim survey of contemporary developments, he said that Israel's legitimacy is increasingly being questioned by Arabs, and he warned that Israel faces a new enemy in Lebanon due to Hezbollah's growing influence and that Iran, a former ally, has become "our worst adversary."

"The road will be bumpy and we better brace ourselves," he declared.

Ya'ari, Channel 2 TV's Mideast commentator and the Jerusalem Report's associate editor, spoke at Holy Blossom Temple last week, delivering the final Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture of the season.

Ya'ari, who has also written eight books on Israeli and Arab affairs, explained that advocacy of Israel's destruction was absent from Arab mainstream thinking since at least the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

"It wasn't on the agenda."

The general view in the Arab world was that Israel's "wings could be clipped" and that it could be contained and reduced to its "natural size" through a peace process.

But today, he observed, Israel's existence is on the table once again.

Ya'ari suggested that Muslim extremists, or "Islamofascists," are stoking the embers of this discourse.

In a review of their ideology, he said that they can't tolerate Israel, whatever its borders. As well, they believe that Jews are the bearers of corruption and that there are no historical or religious links between Judaism and Jerusalem, and they regard jihad as a primary Islamic obligation.

He added that a trinity of organizations and powers – Hamas, Hezbollah and Iran – belong to this school of Islam.

Ya'ari said that these Arabs are convinced that they have found an "answer" to western – and Israeli – technological and military superiority in the form of "constant and persistent warfare."

Last summer's war in Lebanon, which pitted Israel against Hezbollah, was perceived as an acid test of this doctrine.

"We've never fought such an enemy," he said.

Muslims who subscribe to this doctrine are neither interested in fighting over territory nor in conquering it, but rather in shedding blood and prolonging the battle, even if it requires generations.

The doctrine is underpinned by a "culture of death" in which suicide bombers are praised, he said.

These jihadists have nothing but contempt for moderate Arab regimes.

"This is what we're facing."

Since the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Arab regimes have generally not deployed their conventional armies against Israel, though Israel attacked Syria during its 1982 invasion of Lebanon and Iraq fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel in the 1991 Gulf War.

But now Israel finds itself up against non-conventional Arab armies: Hezbollah in Lebanon and Palestinian militias in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

Both present "a complex challenge" to Israel, Ya'ari said.

"Israel was unable, we have to admit, to devise a proper response to this challenge," he said in reference to the recent war in Lebanon and the firing of Palestinian Qassam rockets into Israel.

Describing the second war in Lebanon as "a strategic tragedy" rather than "a strategic disaster," Ya'ari said Israel didn't exploit opportunities to deliver a knockout punch to Hezbollah.

Israel conducted the war in a half-hearted, improvisational fashion, he charged.

Meanwhile, the battlefront has shifted to Beirut, where Hezbollah is trying to seize control of Lebanon's government, he said.

Ya'ari added that if Israel allows Hamas to "militarize" the West Bank in the wake of the ceasefire in Gaza, Hamas will soon be able to manufacture Qassam rockets and thus threaten Israel's heartland.

According to Ya'ari, Hamas desperately wanted a truce to consolidate its power and arm itself.

In a dire warning, he said that if Israel doesn't move fast enough, the opportunity for a two-state solution will vanish into thin air.

A comprehensive agreement in which permanent-status issues are settled is currently beyond reach, he said.

What is now realistically attainable is an armistice accord in which the provisional boundaries of a Palestinian state are established and Israel withdraws from parts of the West Bank.

"This, it seems to be, is the only formula that can work."

Qur'an contains no claim on Jerusalem: lecturer

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the early years of Islam, Jerusalem served as the "axis of orientation" for Muhammad and his followers. Islam was "a primordial faith" that looked approvingly on the Old and New Testaments and accepted the Jewish and Christian prophets as its own.

Later, however, Muhammad turned to Mecca to pray and the Arabian city became the focal point of the emerging religion.

"That meant any future claims of Muslims on Jerusalem were taken away by an omniscient and merciful God."

That unexpected exegesis – that the Qur'an does not give Muslims a claim to the city of Jerusalem – was part of a thought-provoking lecture delivered by Salim Mansur at the inaugural Begin-Sadat Lecture last week.

The lecture coincided with the 25th anniversary of the murder of Anwar Sadat, the former president of Egypt. It was sponsored by the Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD), a non-partisan, multi-religious organization dedicated to the promotion of democracy.

Mansur, a professor of political science at the University of Western Ontario and senior fellow with the CCD, said Jerusalem remains holy in Islam and Muslims retain a spiritual connection to the city. "But it is not the centre of Islam."

Furthermore, Jerusalem has never served as a capital of any Islamic dynasty, unlike Damascus, Baghdad and Istanbul, which all have.

Exploring the place of Jews in the Qur'an, Mansur said the Islamic holy book paints a positive picture. They are described as remaining faithful to the one true God, Jewish prophets are respected and the promise by God that Jews would live free and secure in Palestine is accepted.

The right of the Jews to Palestine is part of the faith tradition contained in the Qur'an, Mansur asserted.

Sadat experienced a spiritual journey that took him from European-inspired secular Arab nationalism to the desire to reconcile with Jews and accept Israel. In the period leading up to World War II, Sadat was immersed in the rise of Arab nationalism, which was fuelled by resentment of the British and feelings of betrayal over Palestine. At the same time, "Islamism, the bending of a faith tradition for political purposes," was gaining strength.

Sadat admired Hitler's rise to power and his stated desire to restore German rights. He was part of the officers' movement in Egypt that seized power in 1952, but as Arab nationalism failed in its conflict with Israel, Islamism grew stronger as did its hatred of Jews.

Following the 1973 war with Israel, Sadat came to believe that "a psychological barrier imprisoned Arabs and Israel" and that his trip to Jerusalem could overcome it. His Knesset speech described his inner journey and he spoke of their people's common humanity, of God and peace. Sadat built his overture on the shared religious views of Jews and Muslims, Arabs and Israelis, Mansur said.

Sadat died in 1981 at the hands of Islamic radicals while attempting to repair "the broken triangle of Jews, Muslims and Christians."

In a spirited question period that followed his presentation, Mansur was asked about the Palestinian claim to the land. He repeated his contention that the Qur'an gave the land to the Jews. "If you use a secular/nationalist argument, then it's contested on the field of battle," he said.

Mansur delivered a second lecture on the Arab and Muslim world a day later to the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association at the law offices of Heenan Blaikie.

Kids take part in doughnut project for Israeli soldiers

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

This month, tzedakah money collected from the 122 students at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School on Friday mornings is being designated for a project that provides freshly baked, hot doughnuts – sufganiyot – to Israeli soldiers.

Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School senior kindergarten students, from left, Lytal Ben Avraham, Emma Charney, Tali Pukier and Ethan Wilder show off their cards for Israeli soldiers.

"It's a nice opportunity to say thank you in a sweet way," said Grade 2 teacher Danya Lantz, who is co-ordinating the project at the school. Students have already started making cards and pictures to accompany their donations.

The project was created as a morale-booster by the Israel-based organization Standing Together, along with the Friends of the IDF in Israel.

Friends of the IDF is a sponsor of the project and is helping with the logistics, David Landau, founder and director of Standing Together, told The CJN in a phone interview from Israel.

Although the doughnut project will be ongoing, it kicks off on Chanukah, when sufganiyot are traditionally eaten in Israel.

Earlier this year, Standing Together received a doughnut machine capable of churning out 2,000 hot, fresh doughnuts per hour, thanks to an American donation, Landau said.

The New York native, who has lived in Efrat for 30 years, founded the organization three years ago as a way of saying thanks to Israeli soldiers, particularly those stationed at roadblocks and border sites. It grew out of his spontaneous decision to bring pizza and drinks to soldiers he saw at a roadblock to show them his appreciation.

IDF soldiers who patrol roads and borders "are the unsung heroes of today," said Landau. "They have prevented over 1,000 terrorist attacks in the last year." Some have lost their lives in the process, he added.

Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School senior kindergarten students Ariel Tozman, left, and Aviva Penn show off the cards they made to accompany funds gathered to provide sufganiyot for Israeli soldiers.

"We go wherever the chayalim [soldiers] are," said Landau, who has a chicken and meat business with customers throughout Israel.

Previous Standing Together projects have included distribution of clothing, toiletries and food directly to fighting units on the front, as well as the construction of a mobile cellphone charging unit, and providing personalized bathrobes, gifts and food to wounded soldiers in hospitals, according to the organization's website (www.stogether.org).

For the doughnut project, the organization sent "a couple of thousand" letters asking schools, synagogues and organizations to help out by raising money during the two weeks starting Dec. 10.

This year, Standing Together plans to deliver more than 700,000 doughnuts to Israeli soldiers.

The axis of resistance

By GIDI GRINSTEIN
Jerusalem Post

Guest Voice

Israel has been strategically compromised by an axis of actors that reject its right to exist. For more than a decade, this axis has been successfully denying Israel decisive military victories or political breakthroughs toward securing its existence. It has been able to elevate the impact of terrorism into an existential challenge for Israel. Our national security doctrine has been rendered irrelevant and requires an immediate overhaul.

Israel's challenge is to design a new and relevant counter-strategy based on the political, diplomatic, military and economic tools available to us.

The recent Lebanon war was a painful wake-up call. Israel realized that it has been subject to a consistent strategic disadvantage in spite of its military superiority. With all our might, we are unable to achieve our national security objectives. Much of what we had come to take for granted was revealed as irrelevant.

Building the most powerful and effective fighting force in the region came to dominate our national security. Alas, however, the logic of the axis of resistance is political. In most cases, they will seek to avoid direct military confrontation with Israel that would lead to their defeat. Instead, their objective is to undermine any political progress toward securing Israel's existence and to prevent any decisive military victory by Israel.

We used to think the Palestinian side wanted to end "occupation" and establish a state. But the axis of resistance does not object to a renewal of Israeli "occupation" in Gaza and considers the establishment of a Palestinian state as a setback to its cause.

We built our military doctrine on the assumption that there will be an address, a government, on the other side. The axis of resistance effectively seeks to undermine such governments.

These fundamental issues are compounded by the prospect of a severe American setback in the region. The failure in Iraq, the inability to stop the Iranian nuclear program, the weakness of Mahmoud Abbas, the failure of Israel to win and the muddling in Afghanistan are a very poor record for the world's only superpower and Israel's only ally.

Unless the United States throws many more resources into the problem or establishes clear priorities, it may experience a domino effect from Afghanistan to Cairo. This may compromise Israel in ways that resemble the impact of the decline of the Soviet empire on its Arab proteges.

In the present strategic makeup, Israel's paths toward securing its existence in the region have been effectively blocked while the vision of an Islamic, Arab or Palestinian state in its place is advanced.

In Lebanon, our achievements may be compromised if a pro-Syria and pro-Iranian coalition seizes power. In Gaza, a military victory that will require ongoing presence in Gaza and on the Philadelphi Corridor may reinstitute Israel's status as "occupier" and enhance the existential threat to our future as a Jewish and democratic state. At the same time, Israel is stuck in the West Bank unable to leave unilaterally or through negotiations.

Our challenge is at the level of our national security. It requires a new makeup of politics, diplomacy, economics and military action. Israel is going through an episode of national security confusion, which cannot be allowed to last long.

Israel has to question some working assumptions that have been taken for granted for too long. For example, what is better for Israel: a functioning Hamas government in the Palestinian Authority that may serve as an "address" or the imminent total breakdown of Palestinian governance? Which is more important: preserving Israel's freedom of action or creating closer alliance with moderate Arab countries that are also compromised by radical Shiite Islam?

It is time for Israel to be relevant again and to shape our national security. The ceasefire, if it holds, and the temporary calm in the north, create a good moment to go back to our strategic drawing boards. In the next round, our challenge is to begin to turn the tables.

The two kinds of Jewish feminists

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The question of "women's role" in Judaism is one of the most crucial issues in the Jewish world today. The debate has been heating up since the early 1970s, when articles and books began appearing that challenged the traditional status of women in halachah and Jewish communal life.

A considerable body of literature has emerged, including works that examine and criticize the role of women and call for reform in Jewish law regarding such issues as marriage and divorce, the participation of women in the synagogue, the ordination of women rabbis and so on. Some of these books and articles have been written by men, but the overwhelming majority have been produced by women, many of whom also hold academic positions in the Diaspora and Israel.

As defined by one of the leading feminists in North America, Susannah Heschel, Jewish feminism focuses on attaining complete religious involvement for Jewish women and highlighting the parts within Jewish tradition that already centre around the feminine and women.

By her own admission, such a project involves "changing or eliminating aspects of Jewish law, custom and teachings that prevent or discourage women from developing positions of equality to men within Judaism, as well as bringing new interpretations to bear on the tradition."

The implications of such a radical re-evaluation are clear, as she acknowledges: "If the Torah holds women in positions of subservience or contempt, contradicting women's self-understanding, then feminism concludes that either the God who has revealed the Torah is malevolent or the Torah is not God's revelation, but merely the projection of a patriarchal society intent on preserving its status quo."

Clearly this kind of language is incendiary for those in traditional communities, with its unattractive options of Judaism not grounded in divinity or divinity not grounded in goodness.

Heschel's discourse, containing words such as "patriarchal" (i.e., a male-controlled society bent on preserving male interests) and "women's self-understanding" (i.e., a generalized conception of how women perceive themselves that is "more accurate" than how others see them) are representative of much feminist work. But Heschel's remarks about God and Torah also point to an important distinction within Jewish feminism that must be properly understood: the difference between relatively traditional Jewish feminists, who still maintain an ostensible alliance to halachah and the claims of revelation at Sinai, and those feminists who quite frankly reject classical Jewish claims to the divine nature of Torah and the authentic transmission of the oral law.

In the first category, one might find someone such as Blu Greenberg, who would like to see changes in the halachic system but still feels that such a system is important. Her thesis in her 1981 book On Women and Judaism is that feminism and traditional Judaism have much to offer one another, although she is uncertain whether they can be totally reconciled.

In contrast, Judith Plaskow, in her work Standing Again at Sinai argues that Jewish feminism's attempt to create equal access to a tradition she believes is inherently discriminatory to women is ultimately self-defeating.

To thus speak of Jewish feminism in a monolithic way is inaccurate, and the place that all of these various feminisms will play in the future of Judaism remains an open question.

Emma Lazarus

Lazarus remembered for one poem

Books
Bernard Baskin

What do you know about Emma Lazarus, the American poet, who died in 1887 at the age of 38? She is best remembered for her sonnet The New Colossus, which was mounted on the pedestal of the Statue of Liberty in 1903.

Born into a wealthy, New York assimilated Sephardi family, she was, unaccountably, a feminist, Zionist, fierce defender of her people and a denouncer of anti-Semitism. More Americans encountered Judaism – its history, its culture, its predicaments and its destiny – through Emma Lazarus' writing than through that of any of her contemporaries.

She began writing in her teens, taking up a variety of genres – lyric poetry, blank verse narrative, drama, translation, novel, short story, essay, polemic, even muckraking exposé – and writing the first prose poem to appear in English.

Her interest in Judaism was awakened by George Eliot's novel Daniel Deronda, with its call for a Jewish national revival, and was reinforced by the Russian pogroms of 1881-82. Inspired with a new and sacred cause, she began publishing translations of the great medieval Spanish-Jewish poets such as Judah Halevi and Solomon ibn Gabirol.

She was impressed by the Russian-Jewish refugees whom she encountered when she joined immigrant relief workers on Ward's Island, and energetically defended these "foreigners" against their detractors, who included some assimilated American Jews.

In her poem The Crowing of the Red Cock (the title is taken from the expression used by Russian peasants to describe the burning of Jewish villages during a pogrom), she daringly blames the pogroms on the teachings of Christianity. "Once more the sword of Christ is drawn a million burning rooftrees light/ The world-wide path of Israel's flight./… "When the long roll of Christian guilt/ Against his sires and kin is known/ the flood of tears, the life-blood spilt/ the agony of ages shown/ What oceans can the stain remove/ From Christian law and Christian love?"

In her biography of Lazarus, Esther Schor writes: "Coruscating and uncompromising, the poem stands in judgment on two millennia of Christian anti-Semitism. Emma Lazarus charges Christians with betraying not only the Jews – here 'the folk of Christ' – but also Jesus himself."

In her day, to be removed from traditional Jewish practice was to set oneself apart. Schor explains: "To us, more than a century later, Emma Lazarus' Jewish identity in the late 1870s is not such a riddle; she was a secular Jew, a cultural Jew, an emerging Jewish writer. But in her own eyes and those of her contemporaries, she was simply a conundrum."

One of the pleasures of this intelligent and informative biography is that it brings to life, not only a remarkable personality but also the many-sided era in which she lived. Alert, witty and erudite, she enjoyed the heady delights of the Gilded Age: music, theatre, art, literature and politics. She could count among her acquaintances such luminaries as Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry James, Robert Browning and William Morris.

Here are the 14 lines of The New Colossus. They still have power to stir both mind and heart. "Not like the brazen giant of Greek fame,/ With conquering limbs astride from land to land;/ Here at our sea-washed, sunset gates shall stand/ A mighty woman with a torch, whose flame/ Is the imprisoned lightning, and her name/ Mother of Exiles. From her beacon-hand/ Glows world-wide welcome; her mild eyes command/ The air-bridged harbour that twin cities frame./ Keep ancient lands, your storied pomp!: cries she/ With silent lips, "Give me your tired, your poor/ Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,/ The wretched refuse of your teeming shore./ Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost to me,/ I lift my lamp beside the golden door!"

Chanukah gelt traditions

It's one of the most popular traditions of one of the most well-known holidays of the year. But the authentic reasons behind the giving of Chanukah gelt can leave most people scratching their heads. Today some Chanukah gelt traditions.

In Who Invented Chanukah Gelt? Tina Wasserman writes that "one theory focuses on the name of the holiday. Although Chanukah means dedication, it is linguistically related to "chinukh," which means education. Perhaps for this reason, some Jewish communities chose Chanukah as the time to celebrate the freedom to be educated Jewishly. Maimonides made the education-gelt connection when he described Chanukah gelt as 'an incentive for you [children] to study Torah properly.'" [http://tinyurl.com/y4jrps]

Eliezer Siegel explains that in 18th-century eastern Europe, rabbis toured outlying villages during Chanukah to strengthen the townsfolk's Jewish education. Initially, these rabbis would decline payment. But eventually they would accept tokens of appreciation for lost time. In time, these gifts or gelt became almost obligatory to the rabbis, to other pillars of the community, and then in the 19th century, to children. Other traditions of giving coins or small gifts to kids have also been found in Persia, Yemen and pre-State of Israel Palestine. Siegel adds, "Needless to say, an immense gulf separates the customs described here from the shopping frenzy that is associated with the North American Chanukah." [http://tinyurl.com/yaz335]

According to the Jewish Outreach Institute, there is another direct connection between gelt and the story of Chanukah. After the Temple was recaptured, the Jewish population was able to mint coins as an expression of their newly won independence. After the Temple was destroyed in 70 CE, Jewish coinage ended except for a brief period during the Bar Kochva Revolution. But all that changed when the State of Israel revived the tradition. "In a brilliantly conceived move to link the modern world with the ancient history of our people, the first Chanukah coin portrayed exactly the same menorah that had appeared on the last Maccabean coins of Antigonus Matityahu, 1,998 years earlier." [http://tinyurl.com/vj25f]

There are some original coins on the American Israel Numismatic Association website [http://tinyurl.com/yezttd] and the lovely, modern variations minted by the State of Israel. [www.commem.com/prod04.htm]

Nowadays, most gelt exchanged at Chanukah isn't made of genuine gold or silver but of chocolate. Many of our fond memories for those mesh bags of coins can be traced to Israel's Elite chocolate company. [www.hanukkahgelt.com/] For the homemade touch, why not mint your own chocolate coins – with a hint of mint? [http://tinyurl.com/yzgcm3]

But for some real authenticity, how about a batch of Chanukah Gelt Cookies? But be careful because these treats have real gelt inside. [http://tinyurl.com/ucun9] If you prefer edible coins as an ingredient, check out recipes for Gelt Fudge and White Cheesecake Decorated With Chanukah Gelt. [http://tinyurl.com/ ygcyy9] Sounds good but just not decadent enough? Then whip up a Chanukah Gelt Double Fudge Chocolate Layer Cake. [http://tinyurl.com/yzau49]

Speaking of decadence, in Reframing Chanukah Gelt, Rabbi Goldie Milgram puts a new slant on holiday giving and receiving. She suggests that you gather up all the tzedakah boxes bursting with coins in your home, and pull out a cheque book, too. On one of the nights of the holiday, invite a few friends over and let each suggest worthy charities for all that gelt. Be generous. And meet again next year (or even sooner). [www.rebgoldie.com/gelt.htm]

Speaking of charity, lovers of Sholom Aleichem who can read Hebrew will enjoy his short story Gelt, about two nephews who get Chanukah gelt and a lesson in tzedakah at the same time. [http://tinyurl.com/yg5ldg]

For kids, there's a Hide The Gelt game. [http://tinyurl.com/ye3nn8] And you can search for the gelt right on your computer screen. [http://tinyurl.com/yjl2n6]

You can be sure that gelt has claimed its own niche in popular culture when Martha Stewart offers tips for creating Chanukah Gelt Bags. [http://tinyurl.com/ygmw3u].

Israeli Forum to help fight prejudice

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Gil Blutrich is trying to help heal the rift he feels exists between the Canadian Jewish establishment and Israeli immigrants.

The 41-year-old Israeli entrepreneur and founder of Skyline International Development Inc. first came to Toronto in 1998 and quickly established himself as a gifted real-estate guru.

Though he was too busy setting up his business at the time to notice, he eventually realized there was a serious problem confronting Israeli newcomers.

Israelis settling in Toronto did not feel welcome in their new community, he said.

"I heard a lot of prejudice against Israelis," Blutrich said. "People here tell them things like, 'Why are you here? Why aren't you home defending Israel?'"

Until last year, he always felt like an outsider.

But in November 2005, Galya Sarner, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's strategic community planner, invited him to hear about plans for the fledgling Israeli Forum in Canada (IFC), an independent leadership body representing the cultural and business interests of Toronto's expanding Israeli community.

The idea was to bridge the gap between the Canadian Israeli community and the Canadian Jewish community.

"I co-ordinated a breakfast meeting, and Blutrich took part," Sarner said. "When I asked people for their feedback, Gil wrote a beautiful, touching e-mail, saying how this was the first time he ever felt welcomed by the Canadian Jewish community."

Sarner met with Blutrich again afterward and asked him to chair the IFC.

He accepted with enthusiasm, and for the last year, has worked diligently to ensure its success.

First, Blutrich wanted a cross-section of talents on the IFC's board and proudly states that it is populated by academics, artists and businesspeople.

Names on the board include Walter Arbib, CEO of Skylink Aviation; Yael Soglowek-Ender, part-owner of Soglowek Foods; and Rina Cohen, a professor at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education of the University of Toronto.

Next, Blutrich wants people to know that the time for Israel to be considered a "needy" country is over.

He believes that helping Israelis integrate into the greater Toronto community will ultimately benefit Israel.

"The real support for Israel will come from overseas investment," he said. "This will improve the standard of living in Israel."

One of the long-term goals for the IFC will therefore be to foster a sense of entrepreneurship among Israeli immigrants, so that money can flow back to their homeland from their successes.

On Oct. 26, to cement their community profile, the IFC officially joined with the federation.

The two groups agreed on a historic declaration creating "a fusion model relationship" for "flexibility and creativity in community building efforts in the Israeli Canadian community while connecting the broadest spectrum of the Jewish community through the UJA Federation organization."

Blutrich hopes it will be both a symbolic and a concrete partnership.

"We are trying to break through old paradigms," he said.

Blutrich admits it took about eight months of negotiations between the two bodies to finally hammer out an agreement enshrining the IFC.

Still, both bodies hailed the agreement as a "bold experiment in creating a new mechanism of Jewish community building."

There are still challenges in terms of working out budgets and procedures, Blutrich said.

But with the absorption of the IFC, the federation's leadership is "seriously changing," he said. "Members of the Israeli Forum are now actively participating in the federation."

Blutrich himself is now on the federation's strategic committee.

He is proud of his heritage and considers himself and all Israeli immigrants, as ambassadors for their country.

"Israelis are a different breed," he said with a laugh. "[Canadians] can sometimes misinterpret their strong spirit and warmth."

'Different ways of communicating'

He noted that the federation has been involved for at least 10 years in working with the Israeli community and at one point had an Israeli division in its annual campaign. In addition, "dozens" of Israelis are currently active in the campaign. "Now we want to increase and enhance that involvement."

Part of the federation's effort includes stepping up the production of promotional materials produced in Hebrew, as well as advertising in publications that reach the Israeli Canadian community, English said. They have also looked at adding Hebrew to the federation's website, but the site cannot accommodate Hebrew at this time.

Possible barriers to Israeli-Canadian integration in the past have included differences in ways of communicating that go beyond the actual language spoken. "We are passionate people and we express our feelings [and] have strong body language," Sarner said of her fellow Israelis. Because Canadians are typically more reserved, Israelis may think they don't care, she added. But she said she has "thousands" of examples that that is just not true.

Canadians help revise Encyclopedia Judaica

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Canadian co-editors of the revised and updated edition of the Encyclopedia Judaica, due to be published on Dec. 8, are Harold (Hesh) Troper and Richard Menkis, two of Canada's most distinguished academics.

Harold Troper

Richard Menkis

Troper, a Toronto historian based at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, was the co-author, with Irving Abella, of the classic, None Is Too Many, an award-winning account of Canada's immigration policy in the 1930s and '40s as it related to European Jewish refugees.

He has also written The Ransomed of God: The Secret Rescue of the Jews of Syria and Old Wounds: Jews, Ukrainians and the Hunt for Nazi War Criminals in Canada.

Menkis, a professor of history and religious studies at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver, was the founding editor of the journal Canadian Jewish Studies.

His publications include Canadian Jewish Studies Reader, Jews and Judaism in Canada: A Bibliography of Published Works Since 1965 and New Perspectives on Canada, the Holocaust and Survivors.

He and Troper also contributed an essay on Toronto's Jewish community to College Street: Toronto's Renaissance Strip, published earlier this year.

Michael Berenbaum, the executive editor of the Encyclopedia Judaica, recruited Troper and Menkis.

"I got a call from Berenbaum in the spring of 2004 asking if I would take on responsibility for all Canadian content," said Troper. "I knew this would be a massive job and agreed on condition that I could select a co-editor.

"I was lucky that Richard Menkis was willing to partner with me," he added. "Richard is an intellectual powerhouse when it comes to Canadian Jewish studies, and we work well together."

For the most part, they worked directly with the editor in Jerusalem, Fred Skolnik.

Troper said that the assignment was more difficult than he had imagined.

"The work was harder, more complicated and took far longer. That meant that things I'd been working on – a book about Canadian Jews in the 1960s – and getting ready for a sabbatical would have to be juggled with the encyclopedia."

Menkis agrees.

"It was harder and more time consuming than I had thought. We took it seriously, but didn't take ourselves too seriously and tried to laugh our way through the rough patches the articles that came in much too long, or much too short, or needed a great deal of editing. Thankfully, our phone companies had flat rates, because we spent hours on the phone editing together. And, of course, we used e-mail. The Encyclopedia Judaica folder in my e-mail package contains 1,739 e-mails."

The old edition, published in 1972 and containing 130 articles on Canada, had to be reworked.

"We read them all, but decided that the majority had to be completely redone," said Menkis. "The previous edition appeared over 30 years ago, which means it was based on research of 35 years ago. Since then, Canadian Jewry has moved into being one of the largest Diaspora communities. It needed much better coverage to bring it into the 21st century."

Having decided that Canada deserved more articles than the previous edition allowed for, Troper and Menkis commissioned about 240 pieces.

Topics ran the gamut from Canada's Jewish communities and surveys of Canadian Jewish literature (in English, French and Yiddish) to major figures and Jewish institutions.

The major article, however, was written by historian Gerald Tulchinsky and sociologist Morton Weinfeld.

Authors were given guidelines pertaining to style, length and deadlines. "Most kept to the format," said Troper, "but a few didn't."

Troper acknowledged that finding authors for the entries, especially in areas in which he and Menkis were not very familiar, could be daunting.

As a result, they had to write some of the articles themselves.

"Richard and I became the authors of last resort for subjects where we could not find an author," said Troper. "I can't remember the number of entries I ended up writing, but it was a lot."

Menkis personally contributed or co-wrote 19 articles.

Despite the difficulties, Troper and Menkis enjoyed their task of assembling the Canadian material.

"There were rewards," Troper observed. "Getting to work with Richard was one of them. And meeting so many scholars with knowledge of Canadian Jewish subjects was also a reward. Ensuring that the experience of Jewish women and Jews in the arts not high profile in the previous edition was given their due was a reward, too."

They finished their assignment last February.

"We were at it for almost two years," said Troper. "Now that it's done, I have no regrets. Had you asked that question when things were not going well, when it looked like we'd never find writers for key entries or when we were swamped with work, I might have given you a different answer."

Troper believes that the new Encyclopedia Judaica, which will be available in CD format and online some time in the future, will be of immense value. "I think it will be the gold standard for reference books on Jewish life and experience."

Menkis is even more emphatic. As he put it, "The Encyclopedia Judaica is the most important reference tool in Judaica today."

Workman's Circle gears up for 100th anniversary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As the 100th anniversary of the local region of the Workmen's Circle approaches in 2008, regional director Mel Cederbaum is trying to document the organization's rich history.

Working out of the Workmen's Circle's Lawrence Avenue West building, which the group has had for 50 years, Cederbaum says that through pictures and documents, he hopes to provide a historical testament of Jewish Toronto since almost the turn of last century.

Originally from Montreal, Cederbaum, 54, who also works as a computer consultant, says he joined the fraternal organization about six years ago because his roots are with the Workmen's Circle, and he feels a strong bond with it.

His job includes managing the Lawrence Avenue building, assisting various committees in promoting cultural activities, and co-ordinating administrative work.

The organization, he says, started out of a New York City Lower East Side tenement around 1903 by immigrants who wanted health benefits and a setting in which to promote their culture and language.

It was founded on three principles, including rendering aid in moments of stress or emergency, preserving and strengthening cultural Jewishness among its members and the Jewish community, and serving the community by working for social justice.

In its declaration of principles, it states that it devotes itself to the liberation of all people; participates in democratic, progressive, cultural and social endeavours; and is joined with the labour movement in "striving for a higher standard of living and genuine economic security, and in lighting the pathway to further progress and a fuller democracy."

The organization, it says, urges its members to "to work for cultural continuity and Jewish community development, and to serve all causes designed to advance the spirit of true fraternalism among all mankind."

Once the New York organization started, says Cederbaum, "and news spread of its existence, like-minded people in other cities and regions wanted to offer the same benefits to new immigrants.

"Representatives were sent from New York to these regions to install local branches with the same principals and fraternal benefits. The first Toronto branch, Branch 220, was established in 1908."

Established Jewish supplementary school

Among its institutions, the local organization established, in 1911, a Jewish supplementary school that taught Yiddish and Yiddishkeit – it eventually had five branches – and a residential camp, Camp Yungvelt, which is no longer in operation, in Pickering, Ont., in 1925.

Camp Yungvelt was known until the 1950s for accepting poor immigrants' children for little money.

Cederbaum, who is also a vice-president of Mount Sinai Cemetery, says that membership, which now sits at about 230 spread out over seven branches, has declined over the years.

"About 50 per cent of our members are over 80 years old, and 25 per cent have belonged for 50 years," he notes.

Marvin Schiff, a member of the city committee, the governing body of the local Workmen's Circle, joined about 10 years ago, partly because members of his wife's family were longtime members in Montreal, he says.

Mostly, though, he joined for the organization's social and cultural orientation. "It's a secular Jewish organization that is unaffiliated with any congregational secular movement. It's important to have that voice expressed," Schiff says.

"Maintaining the Yiddish language and culture is necessary for historic reasons. It's a very rich one, and we would like to see it flourish."

As well, Schiff says, the Workmen's Circle provides a place for intellectual Jews "of that stripe to come together and discuss political and cultural matters that are not in the orbit of a religious organization.

"There are too few of these centres, and I'd like more people to join us."

Member Dale Langbord, whose grandparents Morris and Becky were founding members and parents Sadie and Karl were longtime members, says the organization "is in my blood. It was part of every facet of my life since I was a child. I was brought up with the philosophy and the Yiddish language."

Cederbaum is looking to attract members "who may not know the rich cultural history of the organization."

As part of its upcoming anniversary, Cederbaum says, he is seeking a grant that will assist them in putting together some cultural events and exhibitions.

Also, Jack Jacobs, a professor of political science at the City University of New York, will speak at a 100th anniversary lecture on Dec. 10 at 10:30 a.m. on the "Young guard of the proletariat: Bundist youth in inter-war Poland."

Following the lecture, Peter Pepper, international president of Workmen's Circle, and vice-president Robert Kaplan will speak on the past present and future of Workmen's Circle.

"The [organization] is an important part of Toronto history, and people should be aware of it," says Cederbaum.

The Canadian Coalition for Democracy (CCD), a conservative advocacy organization, said, "Canada has again legitimized the use of UN resolutions to demonize one nation, while ignoring the truly serious human rights violations of other member states. Until resolutions are applied evenhandedly to all UN members, Canada must express its condemnation by voting 'no' on all such resolutions."

In Geneva, Hillel Neuer of UN Watch suggested the 20 UN resolutions in New York on the Middle East and the ones at the UNHRC have their own dynamic, with multilateral negotiations affecting each vote.

"In truth, each of these 20 resolutions in New York is one-sided and it is not realistic for Canada to change its vote on each one."

He noted that for the past few years, Canada has changed its vote on one or two. "It's piecemeal and it does not necessarily follow an objective or rational approach, but rather reflects the reality that politics and diplomacy often develops in a piecemeal or muddle-through fashion."

In Geneva, the Human Rights Council passed motions slamming Israel's Golan and settlements policies. Canada was the only country to vote against the resolutions. Last year, Canada abstained on the settlements resolution.

The one-sided nature of the UNHRC resolutions prompted Canadian and American Jewish organizations to level their own criticism of the council, saying the organization was continuing the mistakes of its discredited predecessor, the UN Human Rights Commission, which focused almost exclusively on Israel while ignoring rights violations elsewhere.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan weighed in on the issue, saying that he hoped the council would address the Mideast conflict in an impartial way "and would not allow it to monopolize attention at the expense of others where there were equally grave or even graver violations," such as in the Darfur region of Sudan.

Meanwhile, the UNHRC announced that South African Archbishop Desmond Tutu would be dispatched to Beit Hanoun in Gaza on a fact-finding mission to prepare a report on an incident last month in which Israeli artillery fire killed 19 Palestinians. Tutu's mandate is limited to assessing the situation of Palestinians and recommending "ways and means to protect Palestinian civilians against further Israeli assaults."

Neuer called Tutu's fact-finding mission "a fraud."

The UNHRC has already pronounced Israel guilty, he said. Although Tutu "is respected for a lot of legitimate reasons, he is well known as an ardent advocate for the Palestinians… He is clearly not impartial, and choosing him reflects the bad faith of the president of the UNHRC."

Hillel Neuer

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee said, "I think Desmond Tutu long ago forfeited any ability to claim objectivity in assessing human rights or in any other dimension of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"The very idea there would be an investigation of Beit Hanoun while ignoring what led to Beit Hanoun testifies to the cockeyed orientation of the UNHRC," he added.

Fogel, however, applauded Canada's votes at the UNHRC, but added the council's focus on Israel was a disappointing development. "I think we could have predicted it, because the UN as a corporate culture does not take the imperatives of reform seriously."

The UNHRC, he added, was "a dramatic and colossal failure… It has chosen to repeat and accelerate everything wrong about its predecessor. Israel is the only issue that has occupied the attention of this new council. It's quite astounding if you consider 600 kids are being killed every day in the Congo and if you consider Darfur."

Fogel said Islamic members of the council are dominating its agenda as they try to delegitimize Israel.

Turning to Canada's votes in New York, Fogel suggested they "are not really reflective of where the government stands on these resolutions."

He said the government appeared unprepared to address the sheer number of anti-Israel resolutions. "I think they are fairly inexperienced with this and didn't have a fully co-ordinated plan as to how they will approach them."

He suggested Canada is considering proposing an "omnibus resolution" on the Middle East that would replace the large number of individual motions that annually bash Israel. That would require support in Parliament from other parties, as well as backing from a critical mass of Western governments, he said.

Board chair describes an activist Federation

Corporate reorganization and record revenue highlight annual meeting

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA Federation

Citing the Tomorrow Campaign, record fundraising revenue and Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, UJA Federation chair David Engel painted a picture of a proactive, forward-looking, 21st century federation at the organization's annual general meeting last week. The meeting also approved the realignment of UJA Federation into an umbrella corporation and four additional corporate entities (see story on this page) and revealed $161 million in total revenue for fiscal year 2006 - an organization record.

"The courage and the capacity to act quickly, forcefully and boldly are the hallmarks of today's UJA Federation – as is the passion powering our achievements," Engel told 160 annual meeting participants.

It is not enough to simply respond to community needs and challenges, Engel said. Instead, the Federation's role is to "shape the community," an approach that lies behind many current and recent accomplishments. For example, Engel cited the Tomorrow Campaign, which is building three campuses for Jewish life downtown; Central Square in the Bathurst-Sheppard area, where zoning approval has already been received; and in Vaughan, where the 50-acre Lebovic Jewish Community Campus is now being built.

UJA Federation Board chair, David Engel (L), shares a smile with board vice chair David Koschitzky at the recent UJA Federation Annual General Meeting held at Toronto's Adath Israel Congregation.

As well, the Task Force on Jewish Day School Education "symbolizes our determination to lead the way," said Engel. An implementation committee is now examining 23 sweeping task force recommendations. Among them are aggressive efforts, now underway, to achieve fair provincial funding for faith-based schools based on a new approach to the issue.

Engel also discussed the Federation's transformation from a fundraising organization to a philanthropic centre. "Today's Federation is more than what the game of Monopoly calls the Community Chest," he said. The priority is not simply collecting funds and distributing them, but cultivating philanthropy by offering an expanded range of giving opportunities, more personal involvement by philanthropists in the projects they fund and expert advice for donors about philanthropic choices.

On a global level, too, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is taking a leadership role. "Faced with ominous threats to Israel's survival from terrorist militias like Hezbollah and terrorist nations like Iran, we considered it our obligation to shape a global response rather than follow the rest of the world," Engel said. "UJA Federation led the world in establishing an Israel Emergency Campaign from the very beginning of this summer's war with Hezbollah."

Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation, echoed the Federation's commitment to proactive initiatives telling those assembled that "UJA Federation's leadership not only exemplifies the will to survive but the will to excel." Noting that "great things will only happen if we continue to think of ourselves as vital Jews at a vital time," Sokolsky emphasized communal responsibility as the key to achievement: "We accomplished so much over the past year because people worked together; they believed in the community, they believed in each other."

Janice Gross Stein

Janice Gross Stein, a recognized expert on the Middle East and a political science professor at the University of Toronto, and Rabbi Steven Saltzman, religious leader of Adath Israel Congregation, which hosted the annual meeting, also addressed participants.

Jewish Federation revenue reaches record high

Total annual income tops $161 million

For the first time ever, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's total revenue has exceeded $160 million. Revenue from all sources at the federation topped $161 million in 2005/06 – a 71 per cent increase over the previous fiscal year and a 209 per cent increase over 2001/02.

The 2005/06 revenue figure includes gifts to UJA's annual campaign; the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, UJA's endowment arm; and to the Tomorrow Campaign, an unprecedented project to build ambitious new facilities and create new services for Jewish community members throughout the GTA.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto ranks third among the world's largest Jewish federations – behind only New York and Chicago. It is also one of the largest not-for-profit corporations in Canada.

Board chair David Engel notes that in just over a decade, UJA has moved from being in the fundraising business to being in the philanthropy business. "We do more than collect funds and then allocate them from a finite pool," he noted. "We identify new philanthropists. We place before them a larger than ever selection of giving vehicles. We provide expert, objective advice about philanthropic choices, and offer increasingly personal involvement in preferred projects…The possibilities are no longer limited. They are infinite."

Today, UJA holds $200 million in endowment, bequest and planned giving assets, a more than 800 per cent increase over the past decade. This year's annual campaign is expected to raise $81 million.

Elizabeth Wolfe, chair, Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's endowment arm. Wolfe announced last week that the Foundation's assets have surpassed the $200 million mark.

UJA Federation's current Tomorrow Campaign is aiming to raise $250 million to create three campuses for Jewish life in the GTA. The Downtown District, serving Toronto's growing Jewish population in the city core, is anchored by the new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at Bloor and Spadina, with 3,500 members, and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at Harbord and Huron.

Central Square on Bathurst, north of Sheppard, will include, among other facilities, the new Prosserman Jewish Community Centre, a new Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge & Heritage.

The 50-acre Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, in York Region at Bathurst and Weldrick, north of Rutherford, is designed to provide a wealth of programs and services for York Region's Jewish community of 60,000 - the fastest growing in Canada. "Through the Tomorrow Campaign and our philanthropic success, UJA Federation is demonstrating global leadership, which is powered by a collective vision in which one of the world's most significant and unique Jewish communities casts a powerful social, educational, architectural and technological influence on our city's future generations," says UJA president and CEO Ted Sokolsky.

Financial growth leads to corporate reorganization

Unprecedented financial growth has led to a UJA Federation corporate reorganization, intended to better align operations with activities and protect assets by creating separate corporations.

Under the new structure, highlighted at UJA Federation's annual general meeting on November 27, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto will serve as an umbrella corporation, under which four subsidiary corporations will exist reflecting four distinct areas of holdings and initiatives.

Neil Nisker, chair, UJA Federation corporate reorganization steering committee.

- A properties corporation that will hold, through separate corporate entities UJA Federation real estate;
- A services corporation to operate the various programs;
- United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto for the UJA Federation Annual Campaign
- The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto will hold endowment funds.

The parent corporation, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has already been approved and implemented, and in the coming months, the other corporations will be established and assets will be transferred. However, notes UJA Federation general counsel Mark Anshan, the legal changes will not affect existing operations.

Stephen Cole, a member of the corporate reorganization steering committee, announced plans at UJA Federation's recent annual general meeting

שיעור ביניים

גידי קורן וחברים

עלי מוהר

את בארץ הנסיר
על הקיר תאוגה
ומהכיכר תורם הפח
את הצופאה
שהרקע הפרחים
שאי שרה תורים
מהכיכר יצאית עם שחם
שנים שלוש

ומאורע שמורת:
איך אתם כאן סתם
שאור אולית
מיכל ארשאב תגב...

וכך הצאיטם
פתרהו שלוות
הפשטים נשם
אחרשות רעת
ים כוראים וים שצים
ארץ של רוחים-
כך לפ הפנטיר ביאחטם
שניעם יפה

כך לפ היה , משפחת רכפ
לפ הפנטיר ביאחטם
שניעם יפה

היה שלום, עלי, ותודה לך על השירים הנפלאים , אתה תמשיך לחיות איתנו דרכם.

סרטי חובה

הינה שני סרטי חובה למי שרוצה להתרגש:

Volver הוא סרטו החדש של הבמאי הספרדי אלמודובר, ללא ספק היוצר החשוב בעולם כיום. זהו סרט על אם, אחיותיה, בתה ואמה ועל ההתמודדות שלהן בגילוי עריות קשה במשפחה. את הדמות הראשית עושה פנלופה קרוז, ללא ספק סופיה לרן של הדור הנוכחי, ואיתה קבוצה מדהימה של שחקניות ספרדיות. ממש שווה לחכות שנניים לסרט חדש של אלמודובר. עשר בסולם קרן

Shut Up and Sing הוא סיפורן של בנות להקת צמרת הקאונטרי האמריקנית דיקסי צ'יקס, לאחר שהעז בהופעה בלונדון להגיד שהן מתביישות להיות מהסטייט של הנשיא בוש. למתר לציין שרוב אוהדיהן וכל תחנות הרדיו שמשדרות קאונטרי החרימו אותן. הסרט מלווה את שלושת השנים הקשות שעברו עליהן, את הפוליטיקה בארצות הברית, ואת היצחן המתוק שלהן בסופ. סרט מרגש עם מוסיקה נפלאה. רוצו רוצו. תשע בסולם קורן, אבל שישאר ביניע.

Bar mitzvah boy donates $22,000 to SickKids

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If you were 13-years-old and had $22,000 in gift money from your bar mitzvah, what would you do with it?

For Cole Rodness, the answer was simple: give it to an important cause.

"Donating money makes me feel good," said the Grade 8 student at Metropolitan Preparatory Academy in Toronto. "And I think [this feeling] will stay with me the rest of my life."

Cole Rodness

Rodness is sending all of his bar mitzvah proceeds to the SickKids Foundation Autism Research Endowment Fund, a cause that is especially dear to him and his family.

"My cousin Benji is autistic and he's very close to me," related Cole. "When I think of him, I'm inspired and… I really hope this [donation] will make my cousin and other kids [like him] better."

For his efforts, Cole was recently presented with a Kids Believe in SickKids Award. The award noted that his gift was the top tribute donation to the foundation this year.

The idea for the donation originates with Cole's older brother, Jared.

"Jared spent the first three years of his life with a virus that eventually got better," said Cole and Jared's mother, Suzy.

"My brother had set up a research endowment fund in Jared's honour and when Jared's bar mitzvah came along, it was a perfect fit for [gifts] to go toward the research."

Admiring the example that his brother provided, Cole followed in Jared's footsteps, only for a different cause.

"[Philanthropy] has been a huge part of our family," said Suzy Rodness.

"My grandparents and parents taught me about it, and now my husband and I are trying to make the kids understand that you need to give back."

The message appears to resonate with other parents. A recent survey indicates that nearly 90 per cent of parents in Canada believe it's very or somewhat important that their children learn to donate. The study also found that parents are the primary philanthropic role models for their kids.

"Even though you may not realize it, kids really do watch what their parents do," Suzy said.

"Whether it's handing a toonie to a man on the street or giving to a charity, they watch and listen. And they do believe that anything they do will really make a difference."

For more information about contributing to the Autism Research Endowment Fund, call 416-813-6166. or visit www.sickkids foundation.com.

HEALTHY KIDS: Kindergartners at the Toronto Heschel School received a visit recently from Dr. Dan Turner, a Heschel parent and a pediatrician at the Hospital for Sick Children, as part of a unit on health and hospitals. The kids learned about about what to expect during a hospital visit and how to take care of their bodies. CHANUKAH GIFT IDEAS

A chag full of music

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

With Chanukah just around the corner, it's once again time to think about gifts for friends and family.

And what better way to celebrate the Festival of Lights than with new music by Jewish artists.

So sit back, relax and twirl your dreidels in time to some grooves, tunes and compositions.

Pashtes (Simplicity), is the recently released collection of 10 poem-songs by Czech-born Yiddish singer Lenka Lichtenberg and guitarist/pianist Brian Katz.

The album is based on the work of Simcha Simchovitch, acclaimed Yiddish poet and Holocaust survivor.

Using Simchovitch's words, Lichtenberg and Katz have created an evocative assortment of music, spanning genres such as klezmer, jazz, world and classical.

Lichtenberg's passionate vocals, accompanied by Katz's smooth playing and arrangements, makes this an eminently listenable recording.

Pashtes is available from Lichtenberg's website, www.lenkalichtenberg.com

Another fine addition to anyone's CD carousel is The Rough Guide To The Music of Israel.

Out on the Cumbancha record label, the album is an eclectic and uplifting compilation of 14 songs from both popular and emerging Israeli artists.

Compiled by Dan Rosenberg, this "rough guide" captures a snapshot of the diverse musical influences in Israel today.

From Yemeni rhythms to Yiddish lamentations, Arab folk music to Bouzouki-dance, Rosenberg has caught it all and will leave you wanting more.

For purchase information visit www.worldmusic.net.

Those seeking to add even more music to their Israeli collection should seriously consider purchasing The Idan Raichel Project.

Popular Israeli composer-producer Idan Raichel spearheaded an effort to enlist more than 70 musicians on an album dedicated to exploring Israel's burgeoning Ethiopian culture.

The result is a brilliant fusion of world, Arab and Israeli musical flavours.

The Idan Raichel Project is available at www.cumbancha.com and www.idanraichelproject.com

British Columbia singer-songwriter Sarah Noni Metzner released her sophomore album, Daybreak Mourning, back in July.

In case you missed it, Chanukah is a good excuse to pick it up.

The album is equal parts rollicking, nouveau-folk-country romp and introspective, soulful grooviness.

Metzner evokes musical shades of the Indigo Girls and the Cowboy Junkies with a voice reminiscent of Sarah McLachlin.

It's a solid effort and will almost certainly gain a spot on your most-played CD list.

Daybreak Mourning is available from Metzner's website, www.sarahmetzner.ca

If your tastes run to the more classical and experimental, then the latest release from the Toronto Royal Conservatory of Music's ARC ensemble (Artists of the Royal Conservatory) might be for you.

Their album, On The Threshold Of Hope: Chamber Music of Mieczyslaw Weinberg, is an intriguing aural offering.

Weinberg, a Polish Jew who fled Warsaw in 1939, was the protege of renowned Russian composer Dmitri Shostakovich.

Though his works are revered in Europe, it's only now that Weinberg's compositions are gaining recognition in the West.

Recorded last April at Toronto's George Weston Recital Hall, the album offers 14 tracks of discordant but fascinating pieces from the unique mind of Weinberg.

It is the first time these works are available on CD.

Ably played by ARC and produced by Grammy Award-winner David Frost, On The Threshold Of Hope can be purchased via the internet on Amazon.com

Lastly, for the jazz-o-philes, Toronto bassist Shelly Berger offers up his latest CD, Look Up.

From Bela Fleck-esque opening track, Mosque Morocco, Berger takes listeners on a whirlwind tour of his jazz world.

On this, his fourth release, Berger alternates agilely between shuffled grooves and down-tempo reflective pieces.

All in all, Look Up is a relaxed and velvety musical ride from one of Toronto's eminent jazzmen.

The CD can be purchased from Berger's website, www.shellyberger.com.

Film spoofs excesses of today's bar mitzvahs

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Appearances can be deceiving. When I saw the first trailers for Keeping Up With the Steins, I thought this was going to be a typical Hollywood film spoofing the excesses of many of today's bar and bat mitzvahs.

I was pleasantly surprised when I finally did see the film. And now that Keeping Up With the Steins has been released on DVD, I think this is a film everyone can enjoy.

The beginning of the film does follow some of the horrors depicted in the trailer. We have the Titanic-themed bar mitzvah that Adam Fielder is determined to outdo no matter what the cost, especially as it was put on by his arch business rival.

But Adam is brought back down to earth by the return of Irwin, his gray-haired hippie father and his father's girlfriend.

Irwin quickly strikes up a warm, loving relationship with his grandson, Benjamin, and the two of them join forces to teach Adam that love and family are more important than one upping the last outrageous party.

Although the film is very funny, it never loses the true meaning of taking on the responsibilities and challenges of growing up.

The result is a meaningful, warm-hearted film that will delight most viewers and features an outstanding cast that includes Jeremy Piven, Jami Gertz, Garry Marshall and Daryl Hannah.

Another recent DVD release tells the little-known story of a group of young German students who worked against the Nazi regime during World War II.

The film, Sophie Scholl: The Final Days, tells the story of this group, which carried out its operations in Munich and printed and distributed leaflets, painted anti-war slogans on walls and was a continuing nuisance to the Nazi leadership.

Famed Dutch director Michael Verhoeven made a film about the group in 1983, called The White Rose, which describes how the group came about and developed and ends with the arrest of its members.

This new film picks up the story where The White Rose ends and focuses on Sophie, her arrest, her five days of interrogation, and then her subsequent execution.

The new film is a powerful drama that is based on recently discovered minutes of Sophie's interrogation and descriptions of her ordeal. The result is a deeper and better understanding of Sophie's beliefs and convictions and features a terrific performance by Julia Jentsch as the title character.

Sophie Scholl* is a powerful, moving film that ends with hope for the future.

The film is very successful in capturing the hypocrisy of the trial Sophie and her comrades had to endure – a trial in which defence attorneys were intimidated into going along with the circus-like atmosphere in the court and in which the judge, Roland Freisler, steam-rolled over all concepts of true justice.

Sophie Scholl: The Final Days is a powerful, moving film that ends with hope for the future. Not even a decade of Nazi rule was able to extinguish all sparks of justice and humanity from the German people. Even in the depths of depravity, a few good people stood up for their beliefs and were willing to die in order to show that there were still some decent people left in Germany.

It is definitely worth watching.

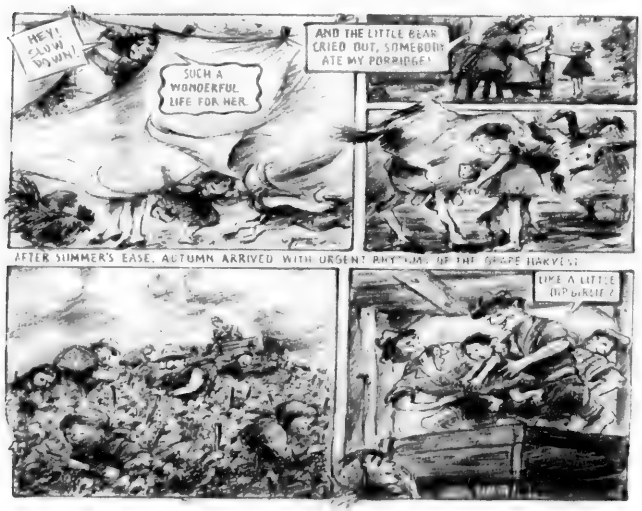
Graphic novel offers a unique wartime memoir

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

We Are On Our Own is Miriam Katin's memoir of her and her mother's struggle to survive toward the end of World War II in Hungary.

What makes it different than other wartime or Holocaust memoirs is Katin's decision to write this as a graphic novel.

The effort succeeds because you can read the entire book in under an hour and still get the whole story, and it's somewhat fitting, since this memoir is told through the eyes of a child.



Not that this is a children's book. Far from it. It is, like most Holocaust memoirs, a dark and stark story, one that includes a graphic depiction of a drunken Russian rape orgy.

Katin, now in her 60s, was a small child during the dark years of the mid-1940s. Her story is about her mother, depicted in the book as Esther Levy. She is cosmopolitan, and fairly well off. With her husband in the Hungarian army, she is left to fend for herself and take care of her young child, the author (Lisa in the book).

With the Nazi occupation of Hungary about to unfold in the summer of 1944, Esther finds a way to escape to the countryside, faking her death and taking on a new identity as a household servant.

To survive, she is forced to seduce a German commander, but eventually, after the German retreat, she is on the run once more, this time from Russian soldiers who accuse her of killing the soldier who tried to rape her.

All the while, Esther bravely tries to protect her daughter's innocence in the mad chaos that surrounds her.

Yet in the midst of this evil, Esther is ultimately forced to depend on the kindness of strangers to survive. This story has a happy ending, which in my opinion contrasts with the subtle subplot about the loss of faith in God.

Published by Montreal's Drawn & Quarterly, We Are On Our Own is a unique take on the memoir genre.

Los Angeles through the medium of photos and words

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sun-splashed, palm-fringed, celebrity-addled Los Angeles is a work in progress, a city whose avid belief in newness and addiction to fads is surely a template of the American dream.

Synonymous with movie making, L.A. is probably the world's most photographed metropolis after New York, Paris and London. And in Picturing Los Angeles, by Jon and Nancy Wilkman, America's second largest city is revealed in all its permutations through the medium of more than 500 black and white photographs. Published by Gibbs Smith and distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, this is an alluring photographic album supplemented by a lucid text.

Given its brashness and affinity for the next new thing, it may come as a surprise that L.A. is older than some might imagine. Formally established in 1781 by Mexicans, L.A. was originally known as El Pueblo de la Reyna de los Angeles, or Queen of the Angels.

But the first photograph of L.A. was not taken until the late 1850s or early 1860s, the authors believe, and it is reproduced in this coffee-table book. The photograph, snapped after California joined the United States, is of a pastoral scene. By then, L.A. was a centre of the American wine and citrus industries and had about 4,000 inhabitants, of whom eight were Jews.

Harris Newmark, one of Los Angeles' first Jewish settlers, and his wife, Sarah

One of the first Jewish settlers, Harris Newmark, emigrated from Prussia in 1853. He helped form the Hebrew Benevolent Society, the city's first charitable organization. Presumably, he also had a hand in the founding of Congregation B'nai B'rith – L.A.'s first synagogue – in 1873. Since then, the Jewish community has grown by leaps and bounds, and is now a major component of American Jewry.

It took an act of will and courage to settle in California when L.A.was still a remote and provincial backwater. The trek across the continent could be hazardous and exhausting, while the voyage through the malaria-infested Isthmus of Panama could be life threatening.

Yet immigrants were not deterred by these obstacles, nor by occasional earthquakes, and California grew and prospered. By turn of the 19th century, L.A.'s economy was based on tourism, agriculture and light industry.

But L.A. did not impress everyone. The anarchist Emma Goldman wrote that it was "a health resort for parasites and cranks, a city… without any personality of its own…"

Her scathing observation notwithstanding, L.A. soon supplanted New Jersey as America's motion-picture mecca. Producers were impressed by its year-round pleasant climate and its geographic charms.

During the first decade of the 20th century, a remarkable generation of "cultural entrepreneurs" arrived in L.A. to set up shop in the budding movie industry, and virtually all of them were Jewish. The first, Carl Laemmle, built Universal Studios in the up-and-coming San Fernando Valley. He was followed by, among others, Samuel Goldwyn, Jack L. Warner and Louis B. Mayer. These immigrants, as commentators have noted, moulded and shaped American culture. Much later, Hollywood was dominated by Lew Wasserman, who rose to be the president of the Music Company of America (MCA).

The Wilkmans claim that 1939 was Hollywood's best year, yielding a bumper crop of films from Gone with the Wind and The Wizard of Oz to Wuthering Heights and Stagecoach. L.A. is still inextricably associated with movies. But by the 1980s, film production accounted for only 1.4 per cent of local jobs.

World War II brought an astonishing array of European refugees to L.A., notably Albert Einstein, Thomas Mann, Bertolt Brecht and Max Reinhardt. Yet L.A. had a darker side. A racist mob murdered 19 Chinese men and boys in an 1871 pogrom, and in 1942, the first batch of thousands of Japanese Americans were declared enemy aliens and deported to isolated camps in California and other Western states.

Nonetheless, California drew nearly nine million newcomers, many from Asia, between 1940 and 1960. As a result, L.A. now has the biggest Mexican, Japanese, Korean, Filipino and Vietnamese communities outside their respective countries. And one might add that L.A. is home to a huge colony of Israelis. This enormous influx prompted L.A. – which seems dedicated to the glories of car ownership – to build its first freeway in 1939.

In an attempt to divine its future, the Wilkmans conclude that L.A. must resolve a constellation of problems, from disparities between rich and poor to the degradation of the environment, if it is to prosper in the years ahead. It remains to be seen whether L.A. is up to that daunting challenge.

Learning Yiddish through folksongs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Children with little or no knowledge of Yiddish can start learning the language through folksongs in Sing and Learn Yiddish, a songbook and CD produced by Muni and Carol Basman.

The user-friendly book includes the words, in transliteration and in English, to 18 favourite folksongs including Oyfn Pripertshik, Dona Dona, Reyzele and Tayere Malke.

Children can listen to the CD, with vocals by Claire Klein Osipov and piano accompaniment by Wendy Brot Stuart, follow the Yiddish words in the book, and read the translations in English.

The book was conceived when the Basmans decided they wanted to teach some Yiddish to their three grandchildren, who live in Mexico.

It is dedicated, Muni says, to his parents, Leybl and Basha. "As a teacher, principal and camp director of the Yiddish schools and camps of the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), Leybl instilled his love for Yiddish in thousands of students and campers."

Many of those who helped compile the book, including Klein Osipov, were his students and campers, Muni says.

Gift shops in hospitals, synagogues, cultural centres offer diverse items

The Jewish community is again preparing to celebrate Chanukah, the Festival of Lights that is observed every December as Jewish people commemorate the victory of the Maccabees and the miracle of the small crucible of oil that lasted eight days.

Among the customs and ceremonies that relate to the holiday are lighting the chanukiyah, savouring latkes and spinning dreidels. In addition, children often receive Chanukah gelt.

Some families present their young children with a token gift every day of the festival, whereas others provide a present at the beginning of the holiday or on the last night. Relatives and friends are often invited to Chanukah parties and want to buy gifts for the host and the children.

But people don't have to be invited to a party to give Chanukah gifts. On the contrary, this is the perfect opportunity to express appreciation to individuals who have been kind and helpful during the year. The recipient may be a neighbour who took in the mail and watered the plants or a Hebrew teacher who voluntarily coached a hospitalized child.

In addition to all the splendid commercial establishments, there are many hospital, synagogue and senior centre gift shops that sell creative and interesting gifts. These nonprofit boutiques are run by auxiliaries, sisterhoods and volunteer committees. The gifts are carefully chosen and some are crafted in-house by talented artisans. There is usually a wide range of prices and proceeds benefit the respective organizations. The items are beautifully showcased and gift-wrapping is often included in the price.

Many items are oriented to the Jewish community – cookbooks, novels of Jewish interest and diverse Judaica, but others offer items of a more secular nature – jewelry, gadgets, games, stationery, sundries, edibles, as well as articles for the home, for the office and for personal use.

So, if you are looking for gifts – now or at any other time think about supporting a worthy cause when you make your choice.

CHANUKAH FOOD IDEAS

Latke lesson online

Just in time for Chanukah, CJN reader Joyce Leitman shares an e-mail exchange she had with her niece, Lauren Corber, who was in Amsterdam last year for a semester of law school.

Lauren requested her aunt's potato latke recipe, and Leitman sent it to her and then sent a copy to her son, Steven, who added to the recipe.

The exchange goes as follows:

Hi Auntie Joyce: I am making potato latkes [for a school party] and the only problem is that I don't have a recipe! I knew that you would have a delicious one! Can you send it to me please?

From Auntie Joyce: Potato latkes is a recipe that is better discussed, but I will try to write it. Read the whole thing before you start doing anything. This step is very important.

Take some potatoes. Lots is best. Even if you think you have enough, add some more. When you are finished peeling, look at them and think very seriously – Do I have enough? Then go and get one or two more potatoes and peel them too.

You should be peeling them into a large bowl, or pot if you don't have a large bowl. Fill it up with enough water to cover the potatoes. Add some salt, even 1 tbsp.

Then you have to start grating. If you don't have a processor and you have to grate these potatoes by hand, put back at least half the potatoes that you took out in the first place.

Then you can start with the onions. They could be chopped to smithereens in the processor or grated by hand.

Potato Latkes as seen in kosher by design by Susie Fishbein, Mesorah Publications Ltd.

How many onions, you may be wondering. There actually is no definitive answer. Steven likes to use lots. I probably use 1 medium onion to 4 or 5 medium potatoes.

The potatoes give off water. Drain them by squeezing them in a colander or sort of picking up the extra water with a large serving spoon.

Now you can mix the onions and the potatoes. Then it is time to add the eggs, salt, pepper, flour or matzah meal.

You are wondering what the quantities should be.

Eggs – beat them a little before you add them. I am guessing when I say to use 1 egg for every four, five or six potatoes.

Just add a little flour or matzah meal. I would say not even 1 tbsp. per potato – maybe a tsp. per potato makes more sense.

Add some salt and some pepper. More salt than pepper. Then mix it all up.

The batter should be "battery" – not too thick or loose, but the egg sort of makes it hold together. Try picking up some batter with a large serving spoon. The middle should be able to hold itself a little higher than the outside. Add an extra egg or two if you think you need it. It really does not need a lot of flour, but as you go along frying the latkes, you could add a little extra flour if you think you need it.

If you want the latkes to taste good, use lots of oil. Make sure the oil is hot before you put any latkes in the pan.

Use a large spoon to pick up the batter. Lower it gently and I am not joking when I say to be careful. Oil splatters and you really have to protect your eyes.

Make sure the heat is high enough but not too high. You don't want the potatoes to burn. The heat should let the latke cook through to the middle and have the outside brown. Then turn it over and do the same on the other side. It is better to turn the latkes over only once.

Make sure they are nice and brown and crispy. Place them on paper towels to drain. Don't eat them too quickly or you will burn your mouth.

Love, Auntie J

From Steven to Lauren: I will add some comments, most of them from lessons learned in the last several years of latke cooking.

Use lots of onion – more is better. A lot of the flavour is from onion, and at your age, it shouldn't cause you too much grief.

I would probably go with 1 onion for every 2 or 3 potatoes (estimate is hard to do since sizes of both vary).

Supplements can't replace nutrients from fruit, vegetables: expert

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Nutrition can be a confusing business, acknowledges Dr. Joe Schwarcz, a professor of chemistry, and director of the McGill University Office for Chemistry and Science.

"Food is a complex collage of chemicals, and [it goes] into the human body, a very complex machine," he said at a recent lecture sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section.

"People want easy answers to [this] problem, but a simple solution is not [always] possible," he said.

Every day consumers receive different advice about specific foods, Schwarcz told the capacity audience at Council House.

"One day we're told to eat fish because of omega 3, and then we find out some fish contain PCBs. Corn was good for us, until we found out that it may be genetically modified, and dark green vegetables were healthy until we discovered spinach was taken off the shelves.

"Organic carrot juice was also removed because some people got botulism, and we worry about drinking tap water because it contains contaminants. We are also afraid, though, of the [chemicals] present in plastic water bottles."

There are risks out there, he said, "but these stories make the news because they are rare."

The bottom line, he said, is that we have to ask what amount of chemicals we can safely take in. "Our water supply is carefully measured, and there are levels at which there is no risk. The benefits of omega 3 in fish outweigh the detriment of traces of mercury. Only the dose makes the poison, and we have to put things in proper context."

Science is not only qualitative, he said. "It is quantitative, and we are always measuring things. Dosage is extremely important."

At the Office for Chemistry and Science, he said, they deal with such issues. "Our mandate is to demystify science. The public needs a place where their questions can be addressed. If we separate sense from nonsense, we can keep people out of the clutch of charlatans."

Science needs to be interpreted in the correct way, he said. "We're always hearing about new miracle foods, but we need to look at our whole diet. Vilifying a certain food is not the way to go, and no food should be put on a pedestal."

Eggs are an example of a food that have a "checkered" past, Schwarcz said."Right now, omega 3 eggs are basking in the limelight, but people are afraid of egg yolks because of the cholesterol. Blood cholesterol, however, does not respond to dietary cholesterol, it responds to fat in the diet.

"If we eat five to seven eggs a week, it should have no affect on blood levels."

It is easy to lead people down "the garden path" by referring to certain studies, he said, "but while they are on the path, they should make sure they stop and pick the fruits and vegetables. Those who consume more fruits and vegetables are definitely better off, and they should be featured in our diet.

"Plates should be filled with a mix of raw and cooked vegetables. The more variety, the better we are."

There is no evidence, he said, that dietary supplements can replace the nutrients we get from fruits and vegetables. "These foods are high in antioxidants, which are not present in supplements."

If he had to address the "biggest single myth" he said, "it would be that natural things are better than man-made. The only way to know if something is dangerous is to test it. We can't tell by its ancestry. It doesn't matter if it's made in the lab or in the bush."

'Quantity is a guessing game'

I'd be wary about grating them, and if you can chop them up pretty small with a knife you'll probably be OK (especially if you use lots of onion, but it's hard to do unless you have a good knife).

The quantity of eggs and flour is a serious guessing game – every time I make latkes I play around with it and see. There's no easy answer and no science.

The biggest key is the consistency of the batter and also the latkes as you are cooking them. Go with your instinct.

If they're falling apart in the pan, you may need more egg; but they can fall apart a bit in the pan at the start when you first put them in and you can push it all back together in the pan.

But if they fall apart when flipping, then more egg and maybe flour (if too wet) are likely needed (though thickness and size will impact the fall-apart issue too).

Bottom line – put in a bunch of egg and flour and see what it looks like. If it looks like your batter is just a lot of potatoes with a bit of stuff in it, you probably need more of the stuff, but it should not look like soup.

Once you get to the point where you're cooking them, evaluate the situation as you go. You are certainly justified in tasting a latke (or two or three) early on for scientific purposes to see if they're OK, and you should consider randomly testing quality at various intervals (they almost certainly will be good, but you want to make sure don't you?) and adjust if needed.

As you will no doubt realize from these e-mails, this recipe really is best written as as the follows:

a bunch of potatoes
a bunch of onions some eggs
some flour
some salt and pepper
a generous quantity of oil (I use olive oil)

Quantities are flexible. Trust your instincts.

I think that covers it.

P.S. Bubbie says to add ½ tsp.of baking powder for 4 or 5 potatoes.

Going 'south' for the holidays

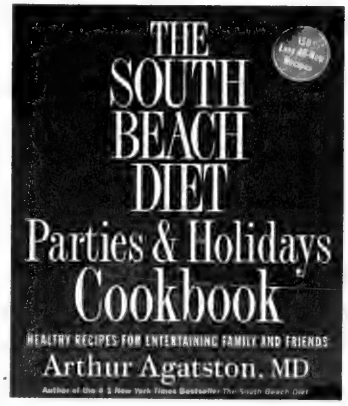
By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

If you're thinking about getting into a bathing suit for your winter vacation, let South Beach be your destination! Entertaining doesn't mean giving up the foods you love. Cardiologist Dr. Arthur Agatston has added yet another book to his popular South Beach Diet cookbook series. In the South Beach Diet Parties and Holidays Cookbook (Holtzbrinck Publishers), there are more than 20 menus and 150 healthy and delicious recipes for entertaining family and friends.

Every recipe meets the South Beach Diet guidelines for healthy eating and great taste. For each menu, there are helpful make-ahead tips for stress-free entertaining. Agatston provides practical advice on maintaining your South Beach Diet lifestyle for celebrations throughout the year and making the best food choices possible, whatever the occasion. Full colour photos offer beautiful table settings, centrepieces and tempting food presentations.

You'll find recipes for Tahini Dip with Veggies, Matzo Ball Soup, Three Grain Tabouli, Roast Turkey with Fresh Herbs, Grilled Ginger Salmon, Paprika Roast Chicken, Mocha-Hazelnut Brownies and Sponge Cake with Chocolate Sour Cream Frosting. Each recipe includes a nutritional analysis and a designation of Phase 1, 2 or 3 of the South Beach Diet program.

Although this book includes some non-kosher recipes, Agatston is sensitive to the needs of his Jewish audience and offers helpful menus and delicious recipes for Passover and Chanukah. Now you can enjoy those latkes without guilt!



From the book: "Chanukah celebrates the triumph of Judah Maccabee and his soldiers in their victory over the tyrant Antiochus more than 2,000 years ago. After a long, hard-fought battle, the Maccabees returned to Jerusalem to find their temple stripped by looters. They cleaned house, made repairs and – having found just enough oil to light the menorah for one day – were surprised and blessed with the miracle of eight days of light.

"Today the holiday is celebrated with the lighting of a candle on the menorah for each of the eight days, in memory of the miraculous oil. Naturally, part of the tradition is cooking foods in oil, including latkes – the potato pancakes that are loved by young and old. Crisp and delicious, they are made here with nutritious sweet potato and zucchini in place of white potato and cooked in healthy canola oil."

SWEET POTATO AND ZUCCHINI LATKES
(Phase 2)

This twist on a Chanukah favourite yields a delightfully crispy and slightly sweet pancake. Prepare the batter right before cooking to prevent excess liquid and soggy pancakes; pour off any excess liquid while cooking, if necessary. These lacy latkes are delicate, so don't press down too hard on them once they are in the pan.

1 medium zucchini (½ lb.), ends trimmed
1 large sweet potato (¾ lb.), peeled
¼ cup minced onion
1 large egg, lightly beaten
¼ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
3 tbsp. canola oil
unsweetened apple sauce (optional)

Slice zucchini lengthwise and remove seeds. Coarsely grate zucchini and potato in a food processor or with a hand grater; transfer to a medium bowl. Add onion, egg, salt and pepper; stir to combine.

Heat 1½ tbsp. of the oil in a large nonstick skillet over medium-high heat. Working in two batches, add zucchini mixture by heaping tablespoons to skillet, gently flattening with the back of the spoon as you go. Cook until the edges are golden, 1 to 2 minutes, then flip and cook until bottom is golden, about 1 minute more (adjust heat if necessary to prevent burning). Drain on paper towels. Repeat with remaining 1½ tbsp. oil and remaining zucchini mixture. Serve latkes hot with applesauce on the side, if desired. Makes 24 (2-in.) latkes.

Per 2 latkes: 100 calories, 1 g fat, 0 g saturated fat, 4 g protein, 20 g carbohydrate, 4 g fibre, 220 mg sodium.

Make-Ahead: Latkes can be made up to 6 hours in advance and kept covered at room temperature. Reheat on a baking sheet (preferably dark bottomed) at 375 until warmed through, about 5 minutes.

BRAISED MINI MEATBALLS
(Phase 1)

If this is your first time making meatballs without breadcrumbs, be prepared for a terrific surprise. They hold together beautifully and are just as delicious as those made with bread.

1½ lbs. extra-lean ground beef
2 large eggs
1 medium onion, finely chopped
½ cup chopped fresh parsley, plus more for garnish
1 tsp. dried basil
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
¼ tsp. salt
2 tsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 cup dry red wine
¼ cup unsalted tomato paste
2 cups lower-sodium beef broth
2 tsp. granular sugar substitute

Combine beef, eggs, onion, parsley, basil, pepper and salt in a large bowl. Mix well with wet hands or a wooden spoon. Form into 36 (1¼-in.) meatballs.

Heat oil over medium-high heat in a large nonstick skillet. Carefully add meatballs to the skillet (this can be done in batches, if necessary) and cook until browned on all sides, 5 to 7 minutes per batch. Pour off any excess fat from the skillet. Return all meatballs to the skillet and reduce heat to low.

Whisk together wine and tomato paste in a small bowl; pour over meatballs. Simmer over low heat, stirring occasionally, until tomato mixture has thickened, about 10 minutes. Add broth and simmer until sauce is slightly thickened, about 30 minutes. Stir in sugar substitute. Sprinkle with additional parsley just before serving. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 12 (3-piece) servings.

Per serving: 120 calories, 4.5 g fat, 1.5 g saturated fat, 15 g protein, 3 g carbohydrate, 0 g fibre and 132 mg sodium.

Make-Ahead: Meatballs can be cooked, cooled and frozen for up to 2 weeks. Defrost in the refrigerator before gently heating on the stove top over low heat.

CINNAMON-CHOCOLATE MANDELBROIT
(Phase 3)

These twice-baked cookies, a Chanukah favourite, are similar to Italian biscotti.

½ cup whole almonds
½ cup trans-fat-free margarine, melted
¼ cup plus 2 tbsp. granular sugar substitute
¼ cup undiluted orange juice concentrate, thawed
2 large eggs
1 tbsp. grated orange zest
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 cup whole-grain pastry flour
1 cup unbleached all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
4 tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. salt
¼ cup chopped bittersweet chocolate or chocolate chips

Latkes: crispy and brown are like gold

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Each family has its own tradition for Chanukah gift-giving, but whatever the tradition, there are always plenty of special foods.

We eat foods cooked in oil in commemoration of the small vial of oil in the Temple that lasted for eight nights rather than one. We eat dairy foods in commemoration of Judith, who fed the Greek general Holofernes salty cheese and then wine to quench his thirst. He fell asleep and she slew him, enabling the Maccabees to win a victory over the Greeks.

Food is an important part of almost every culture's celebrations, and with Jews, it's often the main attraction.

This year on Chanukah, I will be celebrating the bar mitzvah of my grandson Eli, who was born on Shabbat Chanukah, so it will be a double reason to celebrate. My children and grandchildren, who are normally spread across two continents, will be gathering. We have been consulting for weeks in advance, via phone and e-mail, about meals and what to serve during the holiday.

In anticipation of this I have been trying out new recipes and the following are ones that will definitely be on our menu.

Traditional potato latkes as seen in The Jewish Kitchen by Clarissa Hyman, Interlink Books

LATKES

From 15-year-old Nick Schulman, a self-taught cook who won the People's Choice Award from the prestigious James Beard Foundation with this recipe.

3 potatoes, peeled
1 large onion
2 large eggs
1 tsp. cayenne pepper, or to taste
1 tsp. garlic powder, or more to taste
1 tbsp. coarse salt
1 heaping tbsp. flour, more if necessary
vegetable oil for frying

Use the medium shredding disk of the food processor and grate the potatoes. Place the grated potatoes on a clean dish towel. Wrap the potatoes in the towel and wring out all the excess water you can, then place the potatoes in a bowl.

Using the metal food processor blade, puree the onion until it's mushy, but not liquid. Drain any water that has accumulated on the bottom of the bowl holding the potatoes, then add the onions, eggs, cayenne pepper, garlic powder, salt, and enough flour to absorb the excess moisture in the batter, but no more.

Place a medium sauté pan over medium-high heat. Add about 1/4 in. of oil and heat until very hot. Using a soup spoon, place four dollops of batter in the pan. Let the latkes sauté for about 8-10 minutes, without touching them more than necessary so they don't stick, then flip and let cook for about 8 minutes more. The latkes should be golden to medium brown and very crisp. Serve with applesauce and sour cream. Makes 12 silver-dollar size latkes.

SAUCY APPLES AND PEARS

3 Granny Smith or other apples
3 ripe pears
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/4 cup butter or margarine, melted
1/2 cup firmly packed dark brown sugar
2 cinnamon sticks
1/4 cup raisins
1/2 cup chopped pecans
1/2 cup maple syrup
1 tbsp. cornstarch
2 tbsp. water

Core and slice apples and pears; place in a 5-qt. slow cooker. Sprinkle with lemon juice, tossing to coat well. Combine butter and brown sugar; spoon over fruit. Add cinnamon sticks, raisins and pecans; drizzle with maple syrup and stir gently. Cook, covered, on low, 3 hours.

Combine cornstarch and water, stirring well; stir into fruit mixture. Cook, covered, on low, 3 hours or until fruit is tender. Remove and discard cinnamon sticks; serve with latkes or as a topping over ice cream or pound cake. Makes 8 servings.

OLIE BOLLEN

Olie bollen or oil balls are small round Dutch doughnuts that are sold from steaming vats on the streets of Holland during the holiday season. Perfect for Chanukah.

1 envelope dry yeast
3 tbsp. sugar
1 cup warm water, divided
2 eggs, room temperature
1/2 tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. salt
4 cups all purpose flour
3 cups fruit (diced fresh apples, raisins and/or dried currants) oil for frying
confectioner's sugar for dusting

Pour 1/2 cup warm water, about 85 to 115 degrees, into the bowl of a large food processor. Sprinkle the yeast and sugar over the water and mix at low speed. Let stand for five minutes. Slowly mix in remaining water, eggs, vanilla and salt. Slowly add flour one cup at a time. Mix on high for about a minute or two. The dough should turn into a ball and roll around the processor. If the dough does not ball up because it's too dry, add water one tbsp. at a time until it does. If your mixture is more like a batter, add flour one tbsp. at a time. Mix in fruit. Remove from food processor. Place in an oiled bowl, cover with a clean kitchen towel and let rise until doubled, about 1 1/2 hours.

Heat about 2 inches of oil in a large skillet. Punch down dough. Roll the dough into small balls, about 1 1/2 to 2 in. in diameter. Drop dough balls into hot oil, frying until golden brown, turning as needed. Drain on paper towels and dust with confectioner's sugar. Serve hot.

Make mandelbroit in advance

Heat oven to 350. Place almonds on a baking sheet and bake until fragrant and lightly toasted, about 8 minutes. Cool and coarsely chop.

Combine margarine, 1/4 cup of the sugar substitute, orange juice concentrate, eggs, zest and vanilla in a medium bowl.

In a large bowl, sift together whole-grain and all-purpose flours, baking powder, 2 tsp. of the cinnamon and salt. Stir in chopped almonds and chocolate. Make a well in the centre of the dry ingredients, add the wet ingredients and stir just to combine. Using your hands, knead the dough gently until it sticks together and forms a ball. Divide dough in half and shape each half into an 8-in.-long log. Place logs on a baking sheet and press each gently to flatten to 1-inch thickness.

Bake logs for 20 minutes, remove from oven and cool on a wire rack for 10 minutes. Meanwhile, combine remaining 2 tbsp. sugar substitute and 2 tsp. cinnamon in a small bowl.

When logs are cool, use a serrated knife to cut each log crosswise into 12 pieces. Lay cookies flat on the baking sheet and sprinkle the tops evenly with the cinnamon mixture. Bake until cookies are lightly golden, about 12 minutes. Transfer to a wire rack to cool and serve. Makes 2 dozen cookies.

Per cookie: 100 calories, 6 g fat, 1.5 g saturated fat, 3 g protein, 11 g carbohydrate, 1 g fibre, 60 mg sodium.

Make-Ahead: Mandelbroit can be made up to 3 days in advance. Store in a covered container.

CHANUKAH FOOD IDEAS

Israeli vintner says to choose wines you like

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Israeli vintner Golan Tishbi had a mischievous glint in his eye as he unscrewed the cap on a bottle of dry white Chardonnay. "There goes the romance!" he proclaimed to a small group of North American journalists visiting Tishbi Estate Winery.

If it were up to Tishbi, he would use screwcaps in place of corks on all his bottles, but "my customers [would] shoot me, probably."

Currently all Tishbi white wines, and some reds, have screwcaps, a change instituted about two years ago.

Tishbi, 35, who studied wine-making in New Zealand, said that screwcaps preserve the wine the way he made it.

"Cork is natural, it's good… but one out of every 10 bottles is spoiled by cork. With screwcaps you have 100 per cent success."

While traditionalists might view screwcaps as "not kosher" – as Tishbi put it – the wine he produces at the family-run winery that his father Jonathan opened 22 years ago is certified under the supervision of the Zichron Yaakov rabbinate, as is the onsite dairy restaurant.

Tishbi advises customers to choose wines they like rather than following "pre-set notions" about pairing certain wines with certain foods or choosing wines produced only in particular climates.

His best seller, he said, is a Cabernet Petite Sirah, "the simplest, casual, day-to-day easy drinking wine."

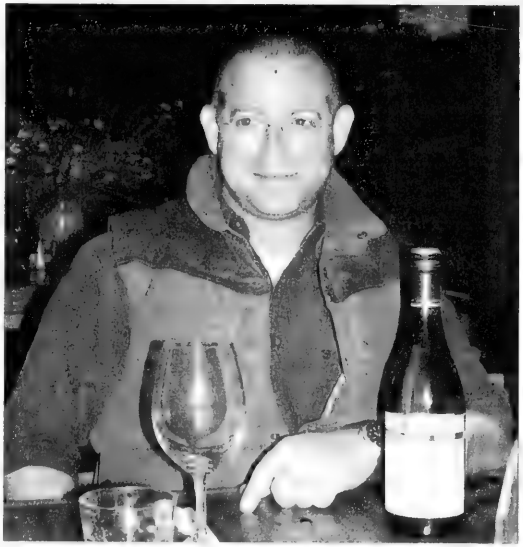
And what does Tishbi prefer? "I drink beer," he laughed. "Goldstar."

He turned serious, however, when discussing wine production, citing Tishbi's lower levels of sulphites than some of its competitors, and its use of clay as a fining agent – the industry term for additives used to clarify the wine – to remove proteins from white wine.

He eschews the use of an equivalent to fish gelatin – sometimes used as a fining agent in non-kosher wines – to absorb phenols and tannins which can give wine an unpleasant taste. If the grapes are not pressed too hard, Tishbi said, the additive is not necessary.

The winery, which now produces 1.2 million bottles a year – up from 700,000 five years ago – also sells its own tchinah, fruit jams and preserves, all made without additives. In January, it will also offer Muscat and Cabernet jellies.

Tishbi's family has a long history in the wine business, dating back to the 1880s. Golan's great-grandparents Michael and Malka Tishbi were among the first grape growers in Zichron Yaacov, now a charming but lesser-known tourist destination. The family name, Tishbi, dates back to a 1925 visit by poet Chaim Nachman Bialik, who gave the couple their new name, an acronym for "Toshavei Shefeya" – residents of Shefeya (a village near Zichron Yaacov), said Golan.



Golan Tishbi, of the family-run Tishbi Estate Winery, says that screwcaps preserve the wine as he made it. [Frances Kraft photo]

The winery is located a short drive from Zichron Yaacov's main street, which is lined for several blocks with 19th-century houses converted to cafés, galleries and shops.

The buildings date back to the days of Tishbi's great-grandparents. "[We] Jewish people are connected to the land," said Tishbi. "This is a hard country… but it's the nicest on the planet."

For more information on the winery, go to www.tishbi.com. Group tours should be booked ahead of time.

Tishbi's Baron Cabernet Petite Sirah and Tishbi Estate Cabernet Sauvignon, a silver medal winner at the 2001 International Wine and Spirit Competition, are available in Quebec liquor stores.

DECKS' DUCK BREAST WITH RED WINE AND HONEY SAUCE

Decks, a well-known kosher grill restaurant overlooking the Sea of Galilee in Tiberias, uses Cabernet Sauvignon as an ingredient in this succulent grilled duck breast. Read the entire recipe to learn the restaurant's "secrets" of success.

Sauce for 6 duck breasts:

1 750-litre bottle of Cabernet Sauvignon
2 cups honey
4 cloves fresh garlic, finely chopped
4 tsp. ginger, finely chopped

Mix all ingredients in large pot on low heat for 1½ hours. Watch closely and stir frequently in order not to burn the bottom.

Grill 6 duck breasts lightly on both sides until browned, but still rare. After grilling, cut into slices. For rare duck, cut thick slices; for well done, slice thinly. Once sliced, continue grilling on hot coals to taste. When done, pour sauce over the duck, and serve.

Three musts for success:
1. The duck must be very fresh
2. The honey must be 100 per cent pure
3. The wine must be Cabernet Savignon (they use Golan)

Also, added a representative of the restaurant in an e-mail, Decks only uses the finest drinking wine in recipes. The duck must be grilled on hardwood, such as olive or walnut, not on coals.

Frances Kraft was in Israel last month as a guest of Israel's Ministry of Tourism.

Ha'aretz critic knows what makes a great wine

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The third annual edition of The Rogov Guide to Israeli Wines (Toby Press), the definitive book about wine produced in the Jewish state, has been released.

Written by Daniel Rogov, wine and restaurant critic for Ha'aretz daily newspaper and a regular contributor to several European newspapers and magazines on wine and food, the guide includes a list and a ranking of all vineyards and wineries in Israel.

As well, Rogov provides a history of wine in Israel; addresses the question of kashrut; and provides lists of the top 10 wine producers, new up-and-coming producers, most improved producers, and the best-value producers.

He also gives talks about drinking habits in Israel and throughout the world, and gives tips on hosting a wine-tasting party

Many delicious ways to make sufganiyot

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

There is no right way of making sufganiyot, the fried in oil jelly doughnuts without the hole served as a Chanukah treat.

One type are created from sweet yeast dough. Lumps of the dough are dropped into hot oil and come out in odd, funny shapes, which are then covered in powdered sugar and/or cinnamon.

The following recipes are two that I've collected over the years. Some recipes are easier and others take a little more work but all are fabulous for Chanukah.

SUFGANIYOT

Recipe from my Presto Deep Fryer

¼ cup orange juice
½ cup margarine
¼ cup sugar
2 packages dry yeast
3½ cups flour
2 eggs, beaten dash of salt
vegetable oil for frying
1 cup sugar
1 tbsp. cinnamon

In small saucepan, combine juice, margarine and ¼ cup sugar. Heat until margarine melts and ingredients are blended. Cool the mixture until it is lukewarm. Add yeast to mixture in saucepan and stir until dissolved. In large bowl, combine flour, eggs and salt. Add to juice-yeast mixture. Mix well.

Turn dough onto lightly floured surface and knead until dough is smooth and elastic. Place dough in greased bowl, cover with a cloth and let rise in a warm place for 1 to 1½ hours.

Punch down. On lightly floured surface, roll dough to ½-in. thickness and cut doughnuts using a 2-in. cutter. Place doughnuts on waxed paper about 1 in. apart and let rise for another 30 to 45 minutes. Preheat oil in electric deep fryer. Fry in hot oil, a few at a time, until golden. Drain well on paper towels. Combine 1 cup sugar and 1 tbsp. cinnamon in a plastic bag and shake well. Then add fried doughnuts, a few at a time, and shake until each is coated with the mixture.

OVEN FRIED SUFGANIYOT

From Light Jewish Holiday Desserts by Penny Wantuck Eisenberg

1 cup skim milk
2 tbsp. unsalted butter
¼ cup sugar
1 tsp. salt
1 large egg
3½ cups (all-purpose flour, lightly sprinkled into measuring cup)
2 tbsp. instant yeast

Syrup:
2 cups sugar
¼ cup water

Sugar coating and filling:
¼ cup sugar

Sufganiyot as seen in kosher by design by Susie Fishbein, Mesorah Publications Ltd.

1 jar seedless raspberry or grape jam

In a medium pot over medium heat, heat the milk and butter until the butter melts. Stir in the sugar and salt. Let cool to 120 (very warm, but not enough to sting your finger). In a large mixer bowl, whisk the egg. Gradually whisk in the milk mixture.

In a separate bowl, mix 2 cups of the flour with the yeast. Add the flour to the egg mixture, and beat it for 2 minutes on a medium speed. Stir in the remaining flour to form a soft batter. Cover and let rise for 30 minutes or until doubled in volume.

Grease 24 mini-muffin cups (2 pans). Flour your hands, and turn the dough out onto a floured worktable. Roll the dough lightly into a log. Cut off small pieces and form the dough into balls, about one inch in diameter. Place 1 ball in each muffin cup.

Spray 2 pieces of plastic wrap with cooking spray. Place over the muffin pans and let the dough rise for 30 minutes.

Preheat the oven to 375 with the rack in the middle of the oven. Bake for 12 to 15 minutes, until the doughnuts are lightly browned. Turn the doughnuts out onto a cooling rack.

While the dough is baking, prepare the syrup. Combine the sugar and water in a medium pot. Stir and heat over medium heat until the sugar has dissolved. Increase the heat and boil the syrup for 5 minutes to thicken it. Turn heat to low, and keep the syrup warm.

Toss the warm donuts in the sugar syrup. Remove the donuts with a slotted spoon, and roll them in the sugar. Fit a pastry bag with a ¼-in. plain (round) tube. Fill the bag with the jam. Poke a hole in the side of each donut with the pastry tip. Squeeze the bag, and fill each donut with jam. Serve as soon as possible.

If you want to make them more than 2 hours ahead, delay dipping them in syrup and rolling in sugar until almost ready to serve. Unsugared, they can be frozen for up to 3 months. Reheat them, covered with foil, in a 350-degree oven for 15 minutes, then dip in sugar syrup and roll in sugar. Makes 20 to 24 small sufganiyot.

A lesson in baking delights

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With a thick blade in his hand and a circular sheet of puff pastry in front of him, renowned chef Anthony Walsh delicately dabs the dough in several spots.

He's creating a goat cheese tarte with sunchokes (Jerusalem artichokes), pomegranate and radish and this simple technique, referred to as "docking," gives some air to the dough so that it doesn't puff up inside. The 18 people on hand appreciate the tip.

We are gathered for a cooking demonstration at the Westin Trillium House resort in Blue Mountain.

The participants are a diverse group, ranging from connoisseurs of haute cuisine to perennial microwave oven meal-makers.

Throughout the demo, Walsh and colleague Todd Clarmo, both of whom are corporate executive chefs for Oliver Bonacini Restaurants, share culinary tips and recipe alternatives.

The experience makes you feel as though you're learning the culinary arts in you're own kitchen.

"The most important thing I've learned is that you can be flexible with food – you don't have to follow the recipe line by line," says participant Shandi Gillespie, 29, from Toronto.

"And it was nice to see that they didn't judge us. They realized that the people here don't know as much about cooking as they do and they tailored the presentation to suit everyone."

Indeed, Walsh and Clarmo's down-to-earth style is calming and welcoming. They alter ingredients, even at the last second, to accommodate dietary restrictions and allergies.

More importantly, their food is exquisite.

The Jerusalem artichoke lying on a bed of cheese atop the tarte melts in your mouth.

And the second creation of the demo, black cod marinated in maple syrup, rum and white miso, is splendid.

Following the food is an informative session on cheese hosted by Scott McKenzie, maitre fromager at Auberge du Pommier.

GOAT CHEESE TARTE WITH SUNCHOKES, POMEGRANATE AND RADISH

1 puff pastry sheet
1½ cups goat cheese at room temperature
2 egg yolks – 1 for cheese, 1 for wash
2 oz. 35 per cent cream
rosemary and thyme
1 tbsp. maple syrup
4 pieces Jerusalem artichoke scrubbed and chopped into 1xl-in. chunks
salt and pepper to taste
1 red beet and 1 golden beet washed and peeled
2 tbsp. pomegranate molasses, juice or grenadine arugula, rocket or watercress assorted radish: daikon, red, breakfast washed
10 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil, divided
1 tbsp. red wine vinegar

Cut four 3½-in. rounds out of puff pastry approx. ¼ in. thick, rub on egg wash, prick surface with a fork, dust with some rosemary and thyme, and bake at 375 for 7 to 10 minutes. Reserve for finishing.

Toss sunchokes in 2 tbsp. olive oil, salt and pepper and 1 tbsp. maple syrup. Place on tray and roast at 350 to 375 until golden and soft. Reserve for finishing.

Combine 1 yolk, the goat cheese and the cream. Add desired herbs, salt and pepper. Place in a piping bag. Pipe goat cheese onto the tartes.

To make dressing, combine 1 tbsp. of red wine vinegar, 2 tbsp. of pomegranate molasses, 8 tbsp. oil, salt and pepper. Whisk well and reserve.

For the beets and radish, slice very thin on a mandolin or with a vegetable peeler; toss in a bowl with the roasted sunchokes. Add dressing and reserve. Before serving, add leaves and gently toss, check seasoning and dress plates with salad.

Place tartes in oven for 3 minutes at 400, finish under broiler, place on top of dressed salad. Garnish with fried vegetable chips or fine herbs and pomegranate seeds.

Food that evokes memories in our readers

Two CJN readers have answered our call for submissions about some of their favourite food memories.

Rochelle Mass, who lives in Gan Ner, Israel, sent the following: My mother would tell me how her mother made lockshen (noodles) each summer – how she rolled the long threads up into balls, placed the tight fists into cotton sacks in the attic ready for kugel and chicken soup all winter long.

What was the recipe? I asked when I got married, and, quite suddenly, many things changed, including how I felt about family history.

The exact recipe – that's what I wanted. But all my mother could tell me was that Baba would drag a sack of flour into the kitchen and place on the table two dozen eggs, a pitcher of water and a cup of salt.

And? I asked.

Well, she'd beat the eggs, add the flour – How much? – and salt.

What else?

She poured in water slowly till the dough turned stiff.

For how long?

About 10 minutes, maybe more, she worked the dough in a huge shissel (pot). Then she'd grab off a large ball, sprinkle flour on the table and roll it out, then cut lockshen-sized strips.

How wide?

Lockshen wide, mother would answer spreading her fingers to about a half inch. Some she sliced thin, others broader.

Baba would drape the strips over towels on every chair and cupboard door, and every other possible surface – the ironing board, clothes hangers – till they were dry. Baba would run her fingers along the dough as though it was new silk, pulling at the strips, stretching them ever so gently. She'd wait, then pile them in heaps and wait again till the summer heat did its work. Then Zaide took the cotton sacks up to the attic.

My grandmother, in a stained striped housedress, her hair pulled into a braid wound and re-wound on her damp head, bending over the kitchen table, the sack of flour and the strips of lockshen binding the entire house in early summer – those memories fell into new patterns when I got married. I didn't consider making my own pasta, but I was determined to make everything else connected with this grandmother – kreplach, knishes, mandelbroit, even pickled tongue, which I never ate.

I could barely cook a piece of chicken and hardly knew how to make a plain white cake. I had one recipe for bran muffins that were never moist. And here I was planning knishes with the kind of dough you pulled with the back of your hand till it slipped over the sides of the table, till you could see through it, till you could roll it over filling of potatoes and fried onions, slice it with the side of your hand as though it was a knife, then pinch in the ends. Such a dream for a girl who had never made sweet and sour meatballs, who couldn't make chopped liver!

I knew I was doing more than collecting recipes. I knew I was searching for connections, looking for what my grandmother knew and what seemed so foreign in my world. I was digging for deposits of family memory.

I asked my mother again and again for details. I felt it was important, although it seemed unnecessary for me to be so busy in the kitchen. Somehow these recipes were points of access into my life.

Baba served coleslaw on Shavuot and poppyseed cookies that were so hard you had to dunk them in the tea. Both were high on the scale of what mattered – also buckwheat latkes with yeast and potatoes. I was busy retrieving, preserving information, like how she packed cucumbers and dill into sealers with her steady hand. The very idea of these delicacies filled my kitchen with power. They restored my grandmother's face, brought her back. I was opening the door to Baba's life, and surprisingly, making my own.

Send us your food memories

I could barely grill a veal chop without burning the edges, probably because knishes, kreplach and mandelbroit blurred my vision. That vision was my touchstone, my talisman. It complicated the early years of my marriage. While desperately trying to make fluffy pancakes for brunch, I was thinking of transparent knish dough.

I know that I was living one life and dreaming of another. I tugged stubbornly at private meanings, trying to find the contour of my memories and hoping to make them into a grid of signals. The past was transformed, and the memories have transformed me. Bringing family history into my kitchen is an account of shared ground.

Forty years later, I can roll knish dough over potatoes and onions, make many variations of mandelbroit and fill a large pot of boiling water with kreplach that hit the bottom then rise to the top when ready. I stuff cabbage leaves the way Baba did. I roll the filling into the centre of the leaf and fold it upon itself, place it gently into simmering beets and tomatoes the way she did. And I did learn to make pickled tongue, which I still don't eat.

Dorothy Lipovenko, from Westmount, Que., sent us the following: Ever notice that certain foods, no matter how easily the recipe can be replicated at home, just taste yummier in someone else's house? This brings to mind two things in particular from my single days in Toronto more than 30 years ago.

The first we affectionately knew as "shmatta cake"; it was anything but. The creation of Faye Grafstein, for whom a Sunbeam mixmaster was a third appendage and whose home in the 1970s was a way station for friends of the Grafstein kids, "shmatta (or angel) cake" was truly within striking distance of the heavens. It was ethereal, feather-light and all-purpose. It was the best thing on which to break a Yom Kippur fast (with tea), cry over a bad breakup (with coffee), or two years and many slices later, make a l'chaim (with a shot of whiskey) announcing one's engagement to the perpetrator of the bad breakup.

Being single did have its perks for me, namely Shabbat meals at the homes of friends whose parents warmly and generously made a place for me at their table. And this brings me to the second item that holds a special place in my memory.

When I was newly married, one of my first Friday night dinners was my attempt to replicate Ruth Laker's wonderfully exotic chicken I'd enjoyed so often.

Mrs. Laker basted chicken pieces with orange juice and dry onion soup mix, and while it sounds deceptively simple, mine has never tasted as delicious. Her daughter, my friend Naomi Laker-Nahmias, informs me by e-mail from Israel that there's half a glass of red or white wine in it too.

But after all these years, I finally figured out what's missing from my version of these two classics: atmosphere. That's the magic ingredient that gave the cake and the chicken their special something. It was the atmosphere around those tables – unique to that time and place – that made some things taste so much better at someone else's house.

CHANUKAH Food Ideas

Pancakes make a festive but simple Chanukah breakfast

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The key to keeping chaos to a minimum on mornings during winter break from school is to serve a meal that is simple, easy, and quick.

Breakfast shouldn't be formal but it should probably be more festive because it's Chanukah.

DOUBLE BANANA PANCAKES

1 cup flour
1 1/4 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. sugar
2 large ripe bananas
1/4 cup milk
2 large eggs
2 tsp. oil

Topping:
1 tbsp. butter
2 large ripe bananas, sliced nutmeg
1/4 cup maple syrup, warmed

In a large mixing bowl, sift together flour, baking powder, salt and sugar. Mix to blend. Set aside. Puree bananas in a food processor, fitted with a metal blade to a smooth, liquid consistency. Transfer purée to a mixing bowl. Add milk, eggs and oil. Whisk to blend well. Add the dry ingredients – whisking to incorporate.

Preheat oven to 250. Heat a griddle. Add butter to bottom of pan. When butter is hot, ladle 2 tbsp. of batter onto griddle, cooking until the tops of the pancake bubble and the underside is brown. (2-3 minutes) Turn and cook other side until golden brown - about 2 minutes more. Transfer to a baking sheet. Continue until all the batter has been used.

To prepare topping: Heat butter in a large skillet. When hot, add sliced bananas – sauté, stirring constantly until bananas are warm, about 1 minute.

To serve: Arrange four pancakes on each of four dinner plates. Top with sautéed bananas, grated nutmeg and warm maple syrup. Makes 12 to 14 pancakes.

PUFFY APPLE CINNAMON PANCAKES

1/4 cup butter
1/2 cup flour
1/4 cup milk
2 eggs
1/2 tsp. salt

Apple Filling
2 tbsp. butter
2 tsp. cornstarch
1 tbsp. cold water
1/3 cup firmly packed brown sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
dash clove powder (optional)
dash of allspice (optional)
2 medium cooking apples, cored and sliced thin
1/2 cup pecan halves
1/4 cup raisins or currants

Heat oven to 400. In a 9 in. pie plate melt 1/4 lb. butter in oven 2-4 minutes. In a large bowl mix together the flour, milk, eggs and salt. Beat 2-3 minutes. Pour the batter into the buttered pie pan. Bake 25 minutes until brown. In a 10-in. skillet melt 2 tbsp. butter. In a small bowl mix together the cornstarch, water, sugar and cinnamon and add to melted butter in skillet. Cook over medium heat stirring constantly until sugar dissolves and mixture thickens. Stir in apples, pecans and raisins or currants. Continue stirring constantly until apples are evenly coated and crisply tender. Spoon filling on to the hot pancake. Cut into wedges and serve immediately. Serves 4 to 6.

PAN SEARED PEACH PANCAKES

4 medium peaches or nectarines (fresh or frozen)
2 cups flour
1/4 cup of sugar
2 tsp. baking soda
3 eggs
1 1/4 cups milk
2 tbsp. butter, melted
1 tbsp. malt vinegar butter
maple syrup

Slice the fruit crosswise about 1/4 in. thick, cutting around pit to form rings if you are using fresh peaches.

In a bowl combine flour, sugar and baking soda. Make well in centre of flour mixture; set aside. In another bowl whisk together eggs, milk, melted butter and vinegar. Add the egg mixture to flour mixture. Stir until moistened.

Add about 1 tsp. butter to a hot, large non stick skillet or griddle. Place a peach slice on hot skillet (or use 2 sections of frozen peaches or canned peaches to make a ring). Pour or spread a scant 1/4 cup batter over peach slice. Cook over medium heat about 2 minutes on each side until pancakes are golden brown, turning when pancakes have bubbly surfaces and edges are slightly dry. Repeat with remaining batter. Serve with maples syrup. Makes 8 servings.

STRAWBERRY LEMON PANCAKES

4 cups strawberries (fresh or frozen)
1/2 cup honey
1 cup orange juice
2 cups flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
3 tbsp. maple syrup
2 cups milk
3 tbsp. butter, melted
2 large egg yolks
3 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. grated lemon peel
1 tsp. grated orange peel
2 large egg whites, beaten

Clean and slice strawberries. Crush 1/4 of the strawberries. In a medium bowl combine the crushed berries with honey and orange juice. Gently stir in the remaining berries; set aside.

In a medium bowl sift together flour and baking powder; set aside. In a large bowl, blend together maple syrup, milk, melted butter, and egg yolks. Add lemon juice, grated lemon peel, and grated orange peel. Slowly add in flour mixture until just moistened. Carefully fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour about 1/4 cup batter onto a hot, lightly greased griddle or heavy skillet. Cook over medium heat about 2 minutes each side or until golden brown. Serve with the strawberry topping. Makes 4-in. size pancakes. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

Student group celebrated for promoting tolerance

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Montreal chapter of Students Helping Others Understand Tolerance (SHOUT) was awarded the Montreal YMCA's 2006 Peace Medallion late last month for its peace work on campus and in the community.

The Peace Medallion is awarded to local groups and individuals who are committed to promoting tolerance, understanding and respect.

"It is very exciting to be recognized for the work that we are doing, to know that it is not in vain and it is not just the nuclear group of SHOUT members who believe in us, but it is something that is needed and respected and appreciated in the greater campus community, in the community of Montreal, and therefore the community of Canada," said Ryla Braemer, the Toronto-based director of special projects for National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) and a SHOUT staffer.

SHOUT, a national organization with chapters in 11 Canadian cities from coast to coast, as well as chapters in Kentucky, was founded last year by March of the Living alumni and is mostly funded by NJCL.

According to the SHOUT website, in early May 2005, 120 students from across Canada, both Jewish and non-Jewish, participated in the March of the Living program in Poland to commemorate the 60th Anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz concentration camp.

"We had a reunion in August and… we talked about taking the lessons of the Holocaust and what we learned about genocide in general and how we can move forward once we are back in Canada," Braemer said.

SHOUT was subsequently created to bring together campus groups to work toward the same goal, which is what separates SHOUT from other student organizations, Braemer said.

"There are a lot of human rights and tolerance groups out there, but I think we are unique in our efforts to join all those together on certain projects."

She said SHOUT has a mission that is twofold.

"One is to educate about genocides in the past and present, and we use the Holocaust as the backdrop to understand genocide. We also aim to bring tolerance and respect to campus, so we see ourselves as a link between other campus groups," Braemer said, adding that more than half of the organization's staffers are not Jewish.

She noted that programs SHOUT has coordinated include tours by Paul Rusesabagina, the real-life hero of the film Hotel Rwanda, and by Nobel Peace Prize winner, author and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel, both of whom came to Montreal.

"We have just started working on a tour with Stephen Lewis [the UN envoy to Africa] that is going to take place in January. We have also developed a program called Witness to History, where we bring together survivors of the Holocaust, the genocide in Rwanda and anyone who made it out of Sudan," Braemer said, referring to the ongoing genocide in that country's Darfur region.

"We've also had leaders' dinners, where we would bring representatives from the main students groups on campus to sit around one table and discuss how we can work together and create a campus culture that is comfortable and tolerant."

Ottawa prof teaches Yiddish 'as a living language'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — If Prof. Rebecca Margolis has her way, not only will the teaching of Yiddish become more widespread, but Yiddish will once again be a modern, vibrant spoken language.

And she's part of an ambitious program at the University of Ottawa that's trying to accomplish these goals.

Speaking Nov. 19 to an invited audience at U of O, Margolis, an assistant professor at the school's Vered Jewish Canadian Studies Program, reviewed the history of Yiddish as a spoken language in a lecture delivered in both English and French.

"To understand this thousand-year-old culture of European Jewry, you have to know Yiddish this is my personal opinion," began Margolis.

Explaining that Yiddish is a Jewish Diaspora language with origins in 10th-century Germany, Margolis described early Yiddish as being connected to the study of Torah and observance of Jewish law.

Beginning with the Jewish Enlightenment of the 19th century, "it was no longer assumed that your goal in life was to do God's will. The Enlightenment meant that a number of ideological cultures appeared and modern Yiddish came into being, as a language itself."

Canada had Yiddish schools in the early 1900s, and some taught only Yiddish while some also taught Hebrew. As well, some taught Yiddish language, some Yiddish literature and history.

However, "history has not been kind to Yiddish. The Holocaust destroyed the culture. Five out of six million Jews who perished were Yiddish speakers," Margolis said.

"In the 1920s, you could get a PhD in Yiddish and about Yiddish in the Soviet Union."

But those days are, unfortunately, gone, she said.

"Because Yiddish has no homeland, and the best way to learn a language is intensely, the only way to learn now is at one of the intensive university programs that exist," she said.

"My vision is to establish Yiddish education at the University of Ottawa on two levels: as a subject of interest, and as a learning tool."

Margolis plans to offer variety of courses and use modern technology

She added that "Yiddish will be taught as a living language, which seems obvious when speaking of any other language. My approach is to make the Yiddish experience a living experience."

In order to do this, Margolis plans to offer a variety of courses and to use modern technological teaching tools.

"Yiddish still uses a textbook from 1947," she said. "The Yiddish teacher today has to work very hard to make it interesting."

She is planning to use an interactive Yiddish teaching program on the Internet to enhance her students' learning experience.

The program at the University of Ottawa is a first in Canada. "Our Canadian Jewish history is so rich in Yiddish… writers, poets, etc.," said Margolis, but as of now, "there is no such thing as Canadian Yiddish studies outside of the University of Ottawa."

York U Foundation head wins fundraising award

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

York University Foundation president and CEO Paul Marcus was given the Community Counselling Service Award for Outstanding Fundraising Professional last month.

Marcus, who was recognized by the Association of Fundraising Professionals (AFP) – the world's largest fundraising organization – is only the second Canadian to win the award.

Marcus was also named the 2006 Outstanding Fundraising Professional by the AFP's Greater Toronto chapter.

Paul Marcus

"It is a great honour, particularly at this point in my career. To be recognized by your peers is really so meaningful. It is very special to win an award for something you love to do," said Marcus, 44, who founded the York University Foundation almost five years ago.

In the past four years, York's fundraising revenue has doubled and the number of donors has increased by more than 60 per cent. In the span of about two years, York has received 13 new gifts of $1 million or more.

In anticipation of York's 50th anniversary in 2009, the foundation recently launched the largest fundraising campaign in the school's history called "York to the Power of 50."

"I think the most important thing is… our $200-million campaign," Marcus said.

"We are already more than halfway to our goal," he said, adding that about $110 million has been raised so far.

He said the money will be used to help students who need financial aid, as well as to attract and retain the best faculty, to keep research a priority at the school, and to ensure that York has the best infrastructure.

"When we receive money, we allocate it right away. We're here to serve the university, and we also need to be responsible and accountable to the donors because they deserve it, and they have a lot of choices and they want to do good."

Although Marcus has been working in the not-for-profit sector for much of his professional life, he earned a law degree from Queen's University and briefly articled and practised at the Toronto law firm Goodman and Carr.

"I learned a lot from professional law, particularly at a great firm like Goodman and Carr, but I knew at a very early stage that I wanted to do something different. The thought of being able to work for a not-for-profit sector and to give back to the community was alluring," he said.

Among Marcus' many accomplishments in the fundraising field, he was the senior vice-president at the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, where he was part of the Best Medicine Campaign that raised more than $150 million, which at the time was the largest hospital campaign in history, Marcus said.

Marcus has also worked as the director of development at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and with B'nai Brith Canada.

He said the success he has had at York can be attributed to a maturing alumni base that wants to give back to the university, and to his experience working with organizations that have a "strong culture of philanthropy."

"This is a reflection of the outstanding charities that I have had the honour to serve, and the great volunteers and donors and colleagues who I've worked with who I have learned a lot from," Marcus said.

"I feel very proud to be part of a fundraising profession that is really coming into its own and developing such depth and expertise," he said.

McGill students hold a benefit for Darfur

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

McGill University students recently held a benefit to raise money and increase awareness of the ongoing humanitarian crisis in Darfur.

The Amazing Benefit Concert for Darfur was held on Nov. 27 at Gert's Bar, an on-campus watering hole.

Organized by Evan Malach, an emerging songwriter and musician, the benefit was a joint presentation of student grassroots initiatives Channel for Change and Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND).

Malach, who was joined onstage by musicians Brandon Luft and Zack Tolsky, performed a mixture of original compositions and cover tunes by such artists as U2 and Neil Young.

In addition to musical entertainment, pamphlets outlining the details of the Darfur conflict were distributed and a presentation was made by Channel for Change leader Ricki Gurwitz. "As students we have a social responsibility to make ourselves aware and to do something about this," she said.

Malach, who likens himself to Live 8 organizer Bob Geldof, emphasized the educational nature of the event. "It's about fundraising because all of the proceeds will go to help Darfur," he said. "But it's also about teaching people here about what's going on there."

Currently finishing a program at McGill in humanistic studies, history, and theatre, Malach said his education has inspired him to help others. "A major thing I took out of the program is recognizing other human beings, not just people in your immediate vicinity, but people everywhere, and to help them with their suffering."

It is estimated that in the three years of the Darfur conflict, 450,000 men, women and children have been killed and two million more made homeless in a genocide led by a government-supported militia called the janjaweed. The conflict has become a hot topic on university campuses across the country, thanks to groups such as Channel for Change and STAND.

"We try to direct attention to the crisis in Darfur by raising awareness through student participation," said Emily Bennett, co-president of STAND's McGill chapter. "Our main three goals are education, advocacy and fundraising."

Currently, STAND activities include financial support of humanitarian organizations working in Darfur, such as Oxfam and Médecins Sans Frontières. The group is also engaged in a letter-writing campaign, urging Prime Minister Stephen Harper to support United Nations intervention in Sudan.

"We put pressure on the government to at least take a strong rhetorical stance, and we'd like to see troop commitments as well," Bennett said.

STAND is also pressuring Canadian universities to divest from corporations operating in Sudan, a move that has already been made by many American universities.

Malach, a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, believes that it is important for the Jewish community to take a stand on humanitarian issues such as the Darfur conflict.

"As Jews, it's important to recognize that it's not just about standing up against persecution and anti-Semitism strictly in a Jewish context," he said. "It's also about recognizing other groups of people and other civilizations who are being persecuted and helping them as well."

86-year-old beats stroke with art

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Ever since she was a little girl, Gertrude Marks has been painting beautiful, vibrant pictures of flowers and still lifes.

Now 86-years-old, she is a prolific artist, churning out dozens of pictures a year at her Forest Hill Place retirement residence in Toronto.

While her works brighten up the décor at Forest Hill Place, it's her perseverance in the face of adversity that earns her the respect and acclaim of staff and residents alike.

In 2002, Marks suffered a debilitating stroke that left her wheelchair bound and without the use of her right hand, her painting hand.

It was a cruel blow and for a time, robbed her of her will to continue painting.

Before the stroke, Marks was an avid, lifelong painter and art enthusiast, producing numerous acrylic pieces over the years.

But Marks was determined to overcome it by learning how to paint again.

"I was afraid to start painting with my left hand [after the stroke], but once I started, I became more at ease and I wasn't scared anymore," she said.

On Nov. 19, Marks' work was showcased at the annual Forest Hill Place Art Show.

Marks credits Martha Johnson, who teaches a two-hour, biweekly seniors' art class at the residence, with helping keep her doldrums at bay and providing her the support she needed to get past her disability.

"Martha is very encouraging," Marks said. "It keeps you going as an artist."

Because of her limited mobility, she has also learned to paint economically.

"I can finish one painting per class," Marks said. "It's effortless now. When I used to paint, I used to be apprehensive after the stroke. But now I just do it and whatever happens, happens."

She admits that many of her fellow residents claim to enjoy her work, but she doesn't let their compliments go to her head.

"My work is lousy," she quipped. "Look, if I believed what everyone tells me, I'd get a swelled head. But I enjoy doing it. I feel very relaxed and... don't think of anything else when I paint. I'm always sorry when my two hours [of art class] are up."

She said she would paint more outside of class, except she doesn't have the wherewithal to drag painting supplies up to her room.

Still, her painting sessions offer her a respite from painful memories.

Marks was born and raised in Rutherglen, a small town just outside of North Bay, where her father owned a general store.

"My mother used to call it 'Rotten Glen,'" Marks said with a laugh. "There were only six houses in the whole town. But it was no place to raise a Jewish family. So we moved to North Bay, where they had a synagogue and my brother could have a bar mitzvah."

In 1938, once she was old enough, Marks travelled to Ottawa to work for her uncle. There she met her husband. "I married him just three months after meeting him," she said.

She raised two sons, Steven and Johnny, and in the course of her years held shows in Ottawa, often attracting crowds of more than 200 people who would eagerly purchase her art.

But that time is gone and Marks doesn't like to talk about the past.

Her husband passed away "many years ago" and Steven died of cancer two years ago.

Her surviving son, Johnny, himself a stroke victim, still lives in Ottawa.

"Steven was the one who brought me to Toronto after my stroke," Marks said. "If it wasn't for him, I wouldn't be here now. Most of my friends and family have passed away. [But] I'm better off here than I would have been if I stayed in Ottawa."

Marks keeps mostly to herself these days, but according to Danielle Woolf, marketing representative of Forest Hill Place, "It's evident that her painting is the light of her life right now."

Marks plans to continue participating in art exhibits and shows at Forest Hill Place and hopes people will come to view and buy her works.

Her paintings usually sell for around $100.

For more information or to view her paintings visit, Forest Hill Place, 645 Castlefield Avenue or e-mail daniellewoolf@lrc.ca

Mentoring program pairs high school, elementary kids

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When 15-year-old Daniel Rosenberg started to tutor a Grade 3 student a month ago, sounding out words was a challenge for the boy.

Now, Rosenberg is beaming because the student isn't merely sounding out words he's reading well.

"This is a big improvement for him," says Rosenberg, a Grade 10 student in Toronto.

"I'm helping this kid and it's really rewarding."

Rosenberg's tutoring is part of a burgeoning after-school program held at the Chabad@ Flamingo synagogue called the Thornhill Student Exchange or TSX.

TSX is a mentoring and community enrichment initiative that pairs high school students with elementary students, who get together once a week for a mix of tutoring, sports and social activities.

Now in its second year, the program boasts 35 kids and an equal number of teens.

"This is more than just community service – it's a form of giving back," says TSX program co-ordinator Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas.

"It's fun and enjoyable and the kids love coming. That changes everything from a schoolwork point of view."

The program is overseen by an advisery board made up of rabbis, social workers, psychologists and teachers.

Before the mentoring starts, the teens are trained for six to eight weeks to learn leadership and mentoring skills.

They are then matched with a student who they work with for 1½ hours each week.

The kids in the program range from being in grades 2 to 7, and the mentors are primarily high school aged.

"They're matched up based on the academic needs of the kids and the strength and the abilities of the teens," notes Rabbi Nachlas.

Half the time is spent studying and the other half is more socially based.

In addition to enriching the academic and social lives of the participants, Rabbi Nachlas points out that the program also fosters community ties.

"There is very little programming out that there combines kids and teens," he says.

"This program brings the community together… and it has the added unique element of being in a Jewish atmosphere."

To that end, Rabbi Nachlas notes some of the social activities are frequently linked with themes from Jewish holidays.

The program is looking to expand, so parents and teens who are interested are encouraged to sign up.

For more information, call 905-763-4040 or log onto www.chabadflamingo.com.

Lawyer, philanthropist recalled for 'boundless generosity'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Wolfe Goodman, 81, a founding partner of the law firm Goodman and Carr, who died on Nov. 24, is being remembered for both his contribution to the legal profession and his philanthropy.

Known as one of Canada's leading estate planning and tax lawyers, he is the author of numerous articles published in various journals.

Called to the Ontario Bar in 1949, some of his professional activities included being chair of the federal sales tax review committee; a governor of the Canadian Tax Foundation; a member of the Ontario Committee on Succession Duty and Gift Tax; and chair of a committee of the Canadian Centre for Philanthropy, where he worked with the officials of the Department of Finance on tax proposals affecting charities.

Donald Carr, Goodman's partner since they founded the firm in 1965, said in a eulogy that as a lawyer, Goodman's learning was "unparalleled. [He had] a prodigious memory, supplemented by a unique ability to weave imaginative solutions for his client's complex problems.

"[This was] combined with a burning abstract interest in the law as a tool for civilized society. [He was also a teacher] both in the formal sense at university, and constantly in his office. [He] was a guide to the young and the not-so-young.

"How many of us benefited over the years, as we figuratively sat at his feet to try and understand and appreciate what he understood and appreciated, and what he clung to in his principled approach to his calling?"

Wolfe Goodman

Carr said that his "mentor, partner and friend" was also known for his benevolence.

"Wolfe was committed to the Jewish injunction of being responsible for others. [He worked] for Canadian Jewish Congress, Jewish Immigrant Aid Society, Canadian National Institute for the Blind, [Ben Gurion University in Israel], and many other organizations that care for those less fortunate," Carr said.

"His generosity was boundless, but he carefully chose to distribute his largesse where he considered it appropriate, and not just because it was the politically or socially correct thing to do," Carr said.

Goodman's "whole being was devoted to the welfare of the State of Israel, to its people, and to our people, as he saw it."

He and his late wife Millie – she died in June – owned a home an a hill in the ancient city of Safed, Carr said, but when it became too difficult for Millie to visit, Goodman donated that home to a school for the blind and bought another one in Jerusalem.

In another eulogy, Nomi Goodman, Wolfe's daughter, said that when her father was talked into helping fundraise for a chair in archeology at Ben-Gurion University, it was on condition that the chair not be named in his honour, "nor in the name of my mother and father [together], but rather be called the Canada Chair in Near-eastern Archeology.

"He was generous in other ways, too. He helped support many of his elderly relatives, and when another relative called to ask for advice when there was a problem with the purchase of a home, he immediately arranged for a line of credit."

Family dinners were fairly formal affairs, Goodman said, "until the birth of the first grandchild. I remember my father [sitting at the head of the seder table] with a baby on his shoulder and a grin from ear to ear."

Goodman, who said her father died because he could not live without his wife, said she never heard him complain.

"Even as his health was declining, he would say 'I have lots to be grateful for,' when asked how he was. That sums up his life nicely. We have lots to be grateful for."

As well as his daughter, Nomi, Goodman leaves another daughter Joy, and three granddaughters, Lisa, Dana and Tali Mailhot.

Monty Berger was 'a phenomenal person'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When Monty Berger became president of Allied Jewish Community Services – now FEDERATION CJA – in 1971, it was in its own way an unusual event.

The federation's presidency was the usual provenance of accountants, businessmen and philanthropists. Berger, although he came from a prominent Jewish community family, didn't fit the mould. He was an honoured World War II veteran, journalist and nationally known PR man, in addition to being active in Jewish community and Montreal life.

Berger, who died last week at age 88, was remembered as a kind, guileless man of abiding integrity who had a universalist's fascination with the world around him and was devoted to his craft, community and family.

"He was just a phenomenal person," Joe King, a friend and colleague for more than 35 years, told The CJN. "He was a brilliant publicist.

"I saw him only a few days before he died. He was throwing out ideas for what to do for the 250th anniversary of the Jewish community in Quebec."

Berger, King recalled, was the first president of the federation when it opened its new headquarters on Cote Ste. Catherine Road.

During Berger's term, King noted, the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal was launched, Jewish poverty became a community priority for the first time, and Berger had to contend with the controversial restructuring of Jewish Family Services when social services fell under the purview of the provincial government.

Still, perhaps most notably, Berger was from a generation of Jewish community "doers." He helped found a synagogue, loved meetings, continued to serve on a large array of federation committees, and did just about everything with discerning judgment. He loved tennis and swimming, and could not be easily categorized.

With Milton Stober, now of Toronto, he co-founded and was first president of Congregation Beth El, initially launched in Stober's TMR home on Lazard Avenue. The Beth El name was coined by Berger's father, who also led the new congregation's first service.

Among his many other activities, Berger became the first Jewish president of the Canadian Club in 1975, served on the board of directors of Royal Victoria Hospital and was a senior advisor to the Montreal Jewish Publication Society. Especially close to his heart was the Ami-Quebec Alliance for the Mentally Ill, which he helped build and where he served as president from 1990 to 1993.

Berger also had a keen interest in politics and the federalist cause. In 1990, he played a leadership role on the Task Force on Federalism, and in 1995, wrote a provocative book ruing the decline of Quebec in the wake of the sovereigntist movement, Lament for a Province: the Tragic Costs of Quebec's Flirtation with Separatism.

Berger is survived by his second wife, Jean Soloway, children Joy and Eric, and three grandchildren. He was predeceased by his first wife, Sonia Mindel, daughter Ann and sister Mitzi.

Education report identifies crisis, but not solution

By JERROLD LANDAU and GILA MARTOW

As reported in The CJN on Oct. 5, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto recently released a task force report on Jewish day school education that contains many conclusions and recommendations .

The report is timely, as meaningful action is sorely needed to address a deepening crisis faced by day schools and families that wish to use them. As the report states, there has been a 9.2 per cent drop in elementary enrolment in federation-funded schools since 2001, and the day school system is "no longer thriving as it was in the early 1990s."

Affordability is a key issue, the report acknowledges, with elementary tuitions, for example, up more than 30 per cent since 2001, compared to a 12 per cent increase in the cost of living. Schools that were consulted, and many of the poorest schools were not, reported that tuition fees are now at the upper limit of affordability, if not beyond.

BARAK
Silver or 14K Gold
416.633.6311

The report also recognizes that disaffection from Jewish causes and institutions, particularly among less-affluent new immigrant communities, are significant trends that are both a cause and result of declining Jewish day school enrolment. Fittingly, as a response, a major recommendation of the report is to increase the portion of our community's children that are enrolled in day schools.

The key flaw in the report, however, is that it gives no real comfort that the problems identified – and especially affordability – will be meaningfully addressed.

In 1990, the federation funded 98 per cent of the costs of family subsidies for funded schools. Currently, federation funds up to 50 per cent, leaving each school responsible to make up the difference. This marks a fundamental retreat from what the report describes as "the community's commitment," made when the subsidy system was implemented, "that no child would be forced to forego a day school education due to family financial constraints." The task force did not recommend that federation should provide sufficient funding to make this commitment a reality.

The report makes no commitment or recommendation to increase subsidy levels even to the rate of inflation, let alone to make the subsidy increases proportionate to tuition increases.

> 'No real comfort that the problems – and especially affordability – will be meaningfully addressed'

The report recommends an ambitious $100-million education endowment fund, but it doesn't recommend that these funds be used to reduce tuition. Indeed, federation spokesperson Howard English told The CJN that "tuitions cannot be lowered without some kind of support from the government," which leads one to wonder what the $100-million fund will accomplish. English's statement is also contradicted by the experience in Cleveland, where the downward trend in day school attendance four years ago was sharply reversed in schools that reduced tuition fees from $9,000 to $6,000 (US), without any government funding. The task force gives no reason for deciding that such a turn-around could not occur in Toronto.

Current federation/Board of Jewish Education (BJE) subsidy guidelines don't reflect the real costs of raising a Jewish family in the Toronto area, and federation-funded schools are prevented by federation policy from providing any greater subsidy than permitted by those guidelines, even if the school pays for it independently by private fundraising. Rather than addressing this barrier to enrolment caused by federation policy, the report's recommendation to centralize administration of the subsidization program will make it even more difficult for schools to exercise discretion to mitigate the impact of the unrealistic federation subsidy guidelines.

The report recommends a loan program to help parents pay for tuition, but this fails to recognize that the typical family's problem is not primarily cash flow but the crushing lifetime cost of tuition. It will not attract people to Jewish education if we ask them to mortgage their future to get there. Rather, it may be another way to drive families away from Jewish day schools.

The report notes correctly that "no action will have a greater impact on the affordability of the day school system than a change in the funding mechanism provincially to assure equity with the Catholic school system." In Quebec where there is partial public funding, more than 50 per cent of Jewish children attend Jewish day schools. In Ontario, with no funding, enrolment is well under 30 per cent.

The report recommends that federation "aggressively support the pursuit of government funding," which is good, but it does not recognize the inherent limitations of federation's activity on this front and the need to work with other organizations.

Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) have been advocating for provincial government funding of non-Catholic faith-based schools for decades, mostly through backroom meetings with government officials. However, such communal bodies deal with the government on a wide variety of issues, and as a result, they are inherently limited as to how aggressive they can be with a government as recalcitrant as the one that's now in place.

Strong action, including well-disciplined but forceful protest activities, is needed to persuade the government to extend fair funding. To effectively advance the cause, our communal organizations must work in tandem with, and depend upon, organizations that don't have such a conflicted, multi-issue relationship with government.

For protest actions, this would fall under the domain of an organization called Parents for Equal Education Funding (PEEF), a parents-based grass-roots organization with the sole mandate of obtaining government funding. Talking to officials is important, but unless backed up by public displays of discontent from our community, such talks will not yield the desired result. PEEF would like to see the entire Jewish community more vigorously back our grassroots initiatives to address the inequality in funding of faith-based schools in this province.

Similarly, any negotiations with the government should be led by an organization that represents all or virtually all of Ontario's Jewish day schools and has the sole focus of obtaining government funding for denominational schools, without the temptation to trade off progress on one issue against stagnation on another. This organization is the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), a school-based organization that represents almost all of Ontario's Jewish day schools (unlike federation). Federation and CJC should recognize their limitations and play an actively supportive and collaborative role that enables the organizations dedicated solely to the funding issue to lead the effort.

Indeed, this is the only approach that has actually succeeded over the past 30 years of effort, when, in fact, these same organizations collaborated to obtain the tax credit (EETC) from the previous Conservative government. No one organization would have been successful alone.

OAJDS is also well positioned to make progress on this issue, as it's a leading member of a multi-faith fair funding coalition of non-funded faith-based schools that includes Armenian, Coptic Orthodox, Evangelical Christian, Greek Orthodox, Muslim, Sikh and Seventh Day Adventist schools. There is strength when religious groups act together.

We were disappointed that organizations and individuals involved in addressing the problems faced by Jewish day schools in Ontario were not consulted by the task force. Apart from people outside Canada, the list of those consulted consists almost entirely of federation insiders. The task force failed to consult schools affiliated with the BJE but not funded by the BJE, and schools as yet unaffiliated with the BJE. Similarly, OAJDS and PEEF weren't consulted, despite the fact they are the main community groups dedicated solely to advocacy on the fair funding issue.

This lack of consultation, unfortunately, led to a report that seems to grasp the crisis, but ultimately does not clearly show a way to successfully address it. Rather than focusing on bureaucratic reorganization, federation needs to focus on effective concrete and inclusive action to dramatically address the barriers to access to Jewish education – especially affordability – that seriously threaten the future vitality of Ontario's Jewish community.

Pro-Israel groups' reception popular at convention

"I find him honest and straightforward. He did well as a minister. I think he has a fairly sympathetic attitude to Israel… He certainly hasn't done anything to antagonize Jews."

Dion has not had a particularly close relationship with the Jewish community, although it appreciates his strong defence of national unity. After the April 2004 St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs firebombing, Dion was among the politicians who came to the school the next morning to condemn the act.

However, he had to backpedal after saying it was regrettable that this happened when not all Jews supported the policies of then-prime minister Ariel Sharon. He was referring to a note left at the scene claiming the firebombing was to avenge the Sharon government's assassination of Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

Dion explained in a Globe article afterward that he meant violence is never acceptable, "no matter what one's opinion of the Sharon government's actions," and applauded the pluralism of Jewish opinion.

Dion dropped in on a reception hosted by pro-Israel Jewish groups during the convention, as did all the other candidates except Martha Hall Findlay, and he was greeted respectfully.

Bob Rae, who quoted Rabbi Hillel in his convention speech, was the first to arrive and was swarmed by well-wishers. Michael Ignatieff was the last to come by at 10 minutes to midnight, when the crowd had thinned out considerably. He allowed a pin twinning the Israeli and Canadian flags to be affixed to his lapel.

The reception was sponsored by the Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and CJPAC, which was formed over a year ago with the goal of getting Jews involved in the political process and bringing community concerns to all parties.

Executive director Josh Cooper said CJPAC has about 3,000 members, and he believed almost all of the Jewish delegates at the convention were members. He emphasized that CJPAC did not endorse any candidate.

The reception was held at the Intercontinental Hotel across from the Palais des congrès after the Thursday night tribute to former prime minister Paul Martin. Guests were treated to a lavish kosher sweet table and liquid refreshments, including the Red Canuck and the Blue Sabra martinis. The coasters bore the slogans "The Liberal Party and the Canadian Jewish community: a Deep Friendship" and "Liberals and Israel: A Record to be Proud of."

On the table were copies of the text of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's latest peace initiative. The CIC added that "Canadians, who strongly support the search for peace in the Middle East, should likewise support Mr. Olmert's offer and call upon the Palestinians to accept it."

Montrealer Jason Caron, a CJPAC activist and a Scott Brison delegate, told Ignatieff he hoped that he would be able to take a postponed trip to Israel, whether he won the leadership or not. According to Caron, Ignatieff said he is eager to go, and especially to visit the north.

Caron was glad to have a few words with Ignatieff because he had declined CJPAC's invitation to discuss community concerns during the leadership campaign.

Ignatieff accepted the CIC's invitation to visit Israel after his remark in October that Israel's bombing of Qana was a war crime. It was later decided that it would not be best to go during the campaign.

One of the few Jewish Ignatieff supporters in the room was Steve Pinkus of Montreal, who wore the candidate's signature red scarf around his neck. Pinkus, a party vice-president, said, "I had the choice of being a positive influence inside or a negative influence outside."

He joined Ignatieff's camp early, having been impressed with his intellect and his earlier views on the Middle East, and decided to remain loyal even though he was shocked by his war-crime accusation.

He said he expressed his disagreement to Ignatieff afterward and feels had an impact on moderating his views by providing him with other information about what happened at Qana.

"I could have taken the easy way out and bolted his campaign or the party, but I thought it was better to have [pro-Israel] voices near him, and there aren't that many," Pinkus said.

Former cabinet minister Elinor Caplan also remained loyal, appearing in Ignatieff's video presentation.

The candidate that generated the most excitement was former Montreal Canadiens goalie Ken Dryden, who was besieged with people wanting photos or autographs.

Present but definitely not in the Ignatieff or Liberal camp was Ariela Cotler. The wife of Mount Royal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler publicly renounced her party membership in a letter in the National Post, after Ignatieff's war-crimes comment.

Ariela Cotler said she had come to join in the tribute to Martin whom she admires and "to be by the side of the man I love," Irwin, who supported Rae from the start. She said she quit the party because she feels Ignatieff's remarks were a betrayal of "Liberal values," not because it is a Jewish or Israeli issue. She said she has not joined another party.

Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein was angry because the Jewish leadership has not spoken out against the Harper government motion recognizing the Québécois people as a nation, and because all Jewish MPs voted for it. He believes that the term "Québécois" includes only those of French origin, and that type of ethnic nationalism should be anathema to Jews.

Other prominent Liberals who showed up at the Jewish community reception included foreign affairs critic Keith Martin, former Ontario premier David Peterson, and former federal cabinet ministers Art Eggleton, Hedy Fry, Pierre Pettigrew and Robert Kaplan.

No proposed resolutions at the convention dealt with the Middle East conflict.

On the opening day of the convention, interim leader Bill Graham issued a statement that the "escalating tension" in the Gaza Strip may lead to a "humanitarian catastrophe in the region.

"While we are heartened to see that the truce that Israeli and Palestinian leaders agreed to on the [preceding] weekend appears to be holding, there are still steps that must be taken to address the human cost of the ongoing instability. Failure to do this may well result in greater insecurity for the entire Middle East. We also hope that the ceasefire agreement will be extended to the West Bank as well."

He urged Canada and the rest of the international community to call on all parties to "adhere to international law and international humanitarian law and place the protection of all civilians as the highest priority."

Richard Diamond of Toronto was elected to the party's national executive as chair of the standing committee on communications and publicity.

Atlantic Jewry reaches out to volunteers, young people

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The newly elected president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, Kathy Zilbert, says that when she started preparing her acceptance speech, her first thought was "survival."

"But after thinking long and hard, I realized that, though small in numbers, we in Atlantic Canada have a lot to offer," said the Halifax woman, who succeeded Halifax's Mark Rosen after he completed a four-year term.

As the 15th annual biennial AJC convention in Halifax concluded, Zilbert stressed the need for more volunteer participation, urged doing small things that will grow into big ones, and making donations to United Israel Appeal (UIA), no matter how small, because they will add up to a large number.

"We have to work harder to be Jewish," she said. "Each Atlantic Jewish community is unique. Can we fix everyone's problems? No. Can we be a resource for them? Yes."

She also reiterated the theme of the weekend gathering of more than 150 Jews from Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia: getting younger members of the community involved actively as leaders and convincing some of the 700 Jewish university students in the region, who mostly come from outside Atlantic Canada, to remain here and establish careers and families after graduation.

"We must mentor those students so they see our area as a viable place to live," said Rosen in his final president's report. "I don't see a lot of young leadership in this room. We need the continued vibrancy of Jewishness in this region."

A Sunday morning session on Israel and the media in Atlantic Canada drew an overflow crowd to hear representatives of CTV, the Halifax Chronicle Herald (Nova Scotia's major daily newspaper) and Rogers talk radio.

When challenged on the manipulation of media by various factions in the Middle East, reporter Marc Patrone of CTV Halifax said people in his newsroom know "when we're being suckered or played. Those who do that must realize it will blow up in their faces."

Chronicle Herald director of news content, Dan Leger, who worked 15 years on-air and as a producer for CBC Newsworld, added, "I always think 'consider the source.' You try to get a broad input of reports and decide what is right."

Patrone said the news media by nature report on things that are sensational. "We reflect that our news consumers want to know about the big events."

Radio talk show host Andrew Krystal, formerly with Toronto's Talk 640 and CFRB, has a daily three-hour program that airs in Halifax, Moncton and Saint John.

"I don't think the people believe the media any more. We have a lot less impact on public opinion than people think," he said.

Leger agreed. "People will choose what they want to believe. We just struggle to keep up."

With financial assistance from several national Jewish agencies and local corporate help, the convention offered sessions on maintaining Jewish life in the region, led by rabbis from Halifax and Fredericton, as well as on challenges for Jewish students, and on the "Dorbyan Diaspora," the global migration of one shtetl's Jews, which was led by Eric Goldstein, a professor of Jewish history at Emory University in Atlanta.

Honours were bestowed on Kathy Zilbert, who received the Lion of Judah pin for a woman making a significant contribution to UIA, and to 90-year-old Ina Kohler of Halifax, who received a Chai award for longtime service to UIA. Kohler came to Halifax from a displaced persons camp in 1948 with her husband and two daughters.

Saturday night's gala featured Israeli singer Liora Simon with three backup musicians. Simon has won awards for songwriting and performs in several languages.

Former lieutenant governor honoured at gala

HALIFAX — When she was a young girl in Saint John, N.B., recently retired Nova Scotia lieutenant governor Myra Freeman carried a little red lunch box to school.

"It had a picture of Queen Elizabeth II on it. I think it was an omen," laughed Mark Rosen, president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, as he recalled the woman he has known since childhood.

The membership of the regional organization honoured Freeman and her husband Larry at a Nov. 25 gala that was tied in with the 15th biennial AJC convention.

Myra Freeman

Men and women from several community groups, all touched by Freeman during her more than six years in office (May 2000 to September 2006), as well as family and hundreds of friends of all faiths, offered several standing ovations. Several speakers praised the first woman in 400 years of Nova Scotian history and the first Jewish person in Canada to hold the vice-regal office.

Attending were federal, provincial and municipal government representatives, senators, top-ranking officials of the military and RCMP in Nova Scotia, as well as foreign consuls.

"You brought pride, dedication, energy, dignity and unfailing grace to the office," said Mark Parent, provincial minister of environment and labour and MLA for Kings North, who represented Premier Rodney MacDonald.

Lynda Haverstock, the former lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan, said, "Myra has earned the title 'honourable' in every sense of the word. You have demonstrated what is right about our government, because you believe in it, your province, the people and Canada."

Freeman made more than 2,000 appearances at events across the province and in her former home at Government House in Halifax, welcoming groups and individuals in a way no lieutenant governor had done before her.

She was honorary patron to more than 100 organizations. She initiated women's leadership programs, set a standard for recognizing the arts, education (she is a former teacher) and motivated thousands of youths in programs as diversified as scouts and guides to music.

She praised her Jewish heritage.

"The Jewish community heritage is our strength," she said. "We are responsible for our own actions, but also to the wider community, since our country, Canada, gave us the opportunity for success.

"I knew I would be representing Her Majesty and the people of our province, but equally and importantly, the Jewish people in our country, and even those who travelled from Europe seeking freedom."

Freeman retained her strong Jewish kashrut traditions in Government House, and she reflected on hosting a member of the Royal Family for a Shabbat dinner.

"It was his first Sabbath dinner and he was so pleased to be part of it with us, as Larry said Kiddush, we lit the candles and celebrated. It was reminder to Larry and I of our pride in our rich heritage and how important it is to maintain our traditions."

When she took office in 2000, Freeman said, her goal was to "plant a seed that would take root and instil a pride and place of confidence in our citizens, to motivate our youth to be the best they could be. I've seen those seeds take root. I feel our country has been strengthened."

In concluding his remarks, Rosen said, "Myra has raised the standards of this office to a level that will be extremely difficult to follow."

'For shalom bayit, everything goes' says Dr. Ruth

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — One would be hard pressed to find a person of any age who is less inhibited about discussing sex in public, yet Dr. Ruth Westheimer claims to be "old fashioned and square."

Well known around the world because of her television and radio shows and guest appearances on popular talk shows, "Dr. Ruth" has also authored more than 31 books and produced several documentaries. The 4 foot, 7 inch sex therapist not only has a clinical practice but teaches at New York, Princeton and Yale universities.

Oh, and she is nearly 80 years old.

The diminutive dynamo, who looks like everyone's bubbie but talks openly and comfortably about a topic that bubbie would never have mentioned, spoke recently in Ottawa about "Heavenly Sex: Sexuality in Jewish Tradition," which is also the title of her newest book.

"I'll tell you first why I believe that someone like me… from an Orthodox Jewish home, can talk about that topic about which we are going to talk tonight, from morning to night, and I believe it is because I am so Jewish," she began.

"I believe that for us Jews, sex was never considered a sin… sex is not just for procreation, but for recreation… under the chupah, a man promises to provide food, shelter and sexual satisfaction."

According to our sages, she said, "anything that can be done to bring about shalom bayit [peace in the home] is permissible… the main message for Ottawa: for shalom bayit, everything goes!"

Speaking with humour, yet treating the subject seriously, Westheimer noted that "a lesson taught with humour is a lesson retained."

She used midrashic tales and personal anecdotes to convey her message to an audience of all ages and backgrounds.

Without hesitation, she tackled even the most controversial of topics, including both abortion and homosexuality.

"If abortion becomes illegal again, only women with money will have access to it. I believe it is a public health issue. I believe it has to be available when there is a contraceptive failure," she said.

Dr. Ruth Westheimer

As for homosexuality, Dr. Ruth separates the people from the act, calling it "particularly troublesome in our tradition. On Yom Kippur afternoon, there is a prayer which specifically lists who can engage in sexual activity."

On the other hand, she said, "when two men or two women come to my office, I treat them with the same respect as anyone else. Respect is not debatable, but there are certain issues that have to be dealt with."

The lecture, the first public program of the new Max and Tessie Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies at Carleton University, was held at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC.) It was jointly sponsored by the centre, Carleton and and the SJCC.

After her lecture, Westheimer took part in a question-and-answer session with Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, then took questions from the audience before signing copies of her book.

Ceasefires and peace talks: Will they lead anywhere?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Three related topics this week.

Initial media reaction to Ehud Olmert's Nov. 26 speech at Sde Boker, which proposed a renewed peace initiative to the Palestinians, ranged from skepticism and confusion to warm acceptance.

The confusion arose as many journalists now find themselves asking how exactly Olmert's peace overtures are going to be translated into concrete actions.

After all, while Olmert's Kadima party ran on a promise of further unilateral withdrawal in the West Bank, no one was expecting any further territorial concessions, at least not unilateral ones.

Yet even if concessions are to be negotiated, the question is with whom? The Hamas-led Palestinian Authority rejects any negotiations with Israel. And PA president Mahmoud Abbas and his Fatah party are weak and divided – certainly not able to deliver "peace and security" in exchange.

The skepticism is understandable, as the media has already witnessed Oslo's promise destroyed by Palestinian terrorism and Camp David's optimism followed by the rise to power of the rejectionist Hamas.

A growing number of journalists understand that the realities on the ground are not propitious for the advancement of a real "peace" process. For this reason, Olmert's speech was given relatively little attention in the West.

Writing in the Winnipeg Free Press, Samuel Segev ("War weariness leads to Middle East ceasefire," Nov. 28) noted a major Israeli concern: that the ceasefire will be an opportunity for Hamas to regroup and even reinvigorate its efforts to smuggle more heavy arms into Gaza and possibly to the West Bank – a breather before the resumption of the "resistance" should attempts at a Palestinian national unity government fail and European financial aid not resume.

In "Ignore James Baker," (New Republic, Nov. 27), Martin Peretz casts a very cynical eye on the Baker-Hamilton Commission that's designed to "rescue" U.S. policy in Iraq from President George W. Bush's failure.

Peretz believes that Baker and the commission fail to grasp "the sheer and relentless butchery of which both Sunni and Shia are capable."

"So what is to be done?" Peretz says that "inevitably, Baker will deploy the only trick he knows: force Israel to retreat to the 1967 lines." He continues: "OK, it can't be forced. Then at least hold a peace conference. The 1991 [Madrid] peace conference actually accomplished nothing, except to pay Bush-Baker's debt to their [Arab] partners in the Kuwait coalition. And the Oslo accords – also nothing. In any case, although many people believe a resolution of the Palestine question is the key to everything, it is the key to nothing but itself."

Carolynne Wheeler's Page 1 Globe and Mail article "Great-grandmother joined legion of suicide bombers," (Nov. 29) described why 68-year-old Fatma Najar, a mother of nine and grandmother and great-grandmother of several times that number, blew herself up in Gaza last week.

On the inside page, the headline reads "Rights group decries 'unethical' use of female bombers," implying that the article would be critical of Najar's act and the use of women and children as suicide bombers. However, Wheeler used most of her story to portray a woman supposedly driven to extreme desperation by alleged Israel oppression, including personal losses in her family and, according to her daughter, Israel's "massacre" in Beit Hanoun.

Only one lone paragraph was devoted to a Palestinian human rights group in Gaza denouncing the use of women and children in combat against Israel.

The broader context was sorely missing in Wheeler's report: that Israel had withdrawn unilaterally a year ago from Gaza and that the Hamas-led government, instead of working to improve life for its own citizens, encouraged terrorist acts. This included launching more than 1,000 rockets, inviting Israel's inevitable military response. There was also no mention of how an entire "cult of martyrdom" has actively encouraged women and children to sacrifice themselves to continue the "resistance" against Israel – a euphemism for the campaign to destroy the Jewish state.

Globe readers need to see this side of the story.

Syria smuggling long-range missiles to Hezbollah

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Long-range missiles, as well as truckloads of advanced anti-tank missiles originating in Iran and Syria, have been smuggled to Hezbollah in Lebanon during the past four months since the war ended this summer, the Jerusalem Post has learned.

The Israel Defence Forces destroyed most of Hezbollah's long-range missile array during the month-long war this past summer, including the Iranian-made Fajr and Zelzal. But according to new intelligence obtained by the defence establishment, in the four months since the war, Hezbollah has received weapon convoys carrying short-range missiles, anti-tank missiles and long-range missiles. Most of the weapon convoys crossed into Lebanon from Syria at night.

With the increasing possibility that Hezbollah protests, launched in Beirut on Friday, will topple the U.S.-backed government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, the Israeli defence establishment had decided not to take any chances and on Sunday raised the level of alert in the north. Israel is concerned that the Lebanese instability will ignite the situation along Israel's northern border.

Hezbollah, Military Intelligence believes, might use the Lebanese political instability as an excuse to launch attacks against Israel – not necessarily by renewing Katyusha rocket attacks like the ones used during the 34-day war this past summer, in which 4,000 rockets were fired at Israel but by firing anti-aircraft missiles at Israeli aircraft flying over Lebanon to collect intelligence.

Israel is concerned that the Lebanese instability will ignite the situation along Israel's northern border

Hezbollah "nature reserves" – camouflaged underground systems of tunnels and bunkers used as hideouts for guerrillas – are still operating in southern Lebanon despite the beefed-up presence of the UN Interim Force in Israel (UNIFIL) and the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) south of the Litani River. These areas are designated as "closed military zones" to UNIFIL and LAF, and are used as training centres for Hezbollah as well as storehouses for their weapons and rocket caches.

The UNIFIL and the LAF presence in southern Lebanon has forced Hezbollah to conceal its weapons, and MI believes that the multinational force is an "obstacle" for the guerrilla Shiite group. If Saniora's government falls, MI does not foresee UNIFIL being automatically expelled from Lebanon, but rather the sponsor countries, including Italy and France, will have to decide whether to pull their troops out.

Hezbollah, MI has learned, has been using the postwar period to rehabilitate its armed wing. MI believes that "sooner or later" Hezbollah will resume military operations against Israel in the form of mortar and rocket attacks on northern Israeli communities as well as kidnapping attempts along the border.

MI believes that if Israel "engaged" Syria and offered a renewal of dialogue between the two countries, Syrian President Bashar Assad would accept the offer without any preconditions. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has ruled out the possibility of talks with Syria, which he has called the "single most aggressive member of the axis of evil."

While there existed a chance for war with Syria – the Syrian military has been at readiness since the war in Lebanon – MI does not believe Assad will initiate a conflict with Israel despite remarks he recently made regarding the option of military action as a means to redeem the Golan Heights.

MI's assessment does, however, cite an "escalation" in tension between the countries due to Syria's support of Hezbollah, including the supply of weapons to the guerrilla group as well as the strategic alliance Damascus has forged with Iran.

Israel's brand ranks last out of 36 countries

By TOVAH LAZAROFF
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — It could take Israel 30 years to change its brand image after it placed last in a study of 36 countries, one of the leaders in the field of nation branding warned Saturday.

Simon Anholt spoke with the Jerusalem Post on the heels of a recent survey he released in which 25,000 consumers were asked to rank 36 countries on issues of tourism, exports, governance, investment, immigration, cultural heritage and people.

According to the study, known as the Nation Brands Index, which has been published four times a year since 2005, "Israel's brand is, by a considerable margin, the most negative we have ever measured in the NBI, and comes in at the bottom of the ranking on almost every question."

Israel is not typically included in the survey, which looks at such as places as the United States, Germany, Mexico, South Korea, China and Singapore. Britain came in first in the survey and the United States was ninth.

It was included in the third quarter survey of 2006 because there is a guest slot in each survey.

"Only Bhutan, the first guest country we included in the NBI, achieved a similarly low score," said the study. But in the case of Bhutan the study attributed its poor score to the fact that few people had heard of it, according to the study.

"Israel's poor scores are clearly not the result of anonymity. It is one of the most known countries in the world," said the study.

The Foreign Ministry's director of public affairs Amir Gissin said the survey underscored for him the importance of the new nation-branding drive Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni launched this fall.

"We see Anholt's research as an opportunity to increase the awareness of decision makers in Israel to the image problem that Israel has in order to make us more determined to deal with the image problem," Gissin told the Post.

As part of that drive, the ministry is looking for ways to focus international public attention away from the country's conflicts with the Palestinians and Hezbollah in favour of more positive images such as the country's technical innovations as well as musical, cultural and historical attractions.

But Anholt warned on Saturday that the Foreign Ministry would have to be very patient before it benefits from its labours. While his 30-year prediction is not set in stone, Anholt said, he warned that changing people's attitudes and prejudice was so difficult and time-consuming that it often took decades. It took Japan and Ireland 30 years to change their public image, Anholt added.

"There are no quick fixes to this," said Anholt, who added that he hoped the Israelis "are very patient."

It was for this reason that he did not believe his study was significantly affected by the fact that it was conducted during the war with Hezbollah in Lebanon over the summer. Israel is often in a state of conflict, Anholt said. It had been his experience, he said, that the survey measured long-seated opinions that were not greatly swayed by current events.

Still, he said, just to be certain, he planned to include Israel for a second time in the survey during a quiet period, "just to ascertain that the results were not skewed."

Anholt said that his study differed from that of other surveys, in that this was not a politically based public opinion poll. It did not measure people's ideas about the conflict with the Palestinians or Hezbollah, but rather it examined people's instinctive associations with the country that would affect their decisions outside the political arena, such as whether they would buy a product from Israel, visit the country or hire an Israeli.

"Israel is famous for all the wrong reasons," Anholt said. People have a negative opinion of it based on a "bewildering variety" of factors that were strengthened with the continual negative images of the conflict that often dominated the news regarding Israel, he said.

Most people did not bother to form a balanced opinion about other countries, he said, preferring to find a simple shorthand for every country. They weaved simple and naive narratives around the facts that were most interesting to them, he added.

The most persuasive and memorable facts for Israel were about the conflict, so the image of Israel as a bully was more likely to stick in people's minds rather than the idea of Israel as an expert in solar energy, Anholt said. These images are "so negative and powerful that they contaminated everything else in the index," Anholt said.

"It is harder for Israeli citizens to work abroad or to get students or other talented people to come to Israel," he said.

"Having a weak or negative brand image is incredibly important to every country," he said.

In Israel's case, for example, the respondents placed it last on the list of countries they would want to visit or which they regarded as having a cultural heritage, Anholt said.

To the question of how willing people would be to live and work in the country, Israel ranked last in every panel, the study said. It fared slightly better on consumer products, but was still toward the bottom, he said.

Overall, he said, a negative brand image made it difficult for Israel to conduct its normal affairs such as selling an Israeli item, engaging in cultural relations or swaying tourists to visit the country.

IDF warns against ceasefire in West Bank

By YAAKOV KATZ and HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — During a security cabinet debate on Sunday about whether to expand the Gaza Strip ceasefire to the West Bank, senior security officials warned that such a move could lead to a spike in terrorism.

To back their argument that continued Israel Defence Forces (IDF) activity is necessary in the West Bank, senior IDF sources in the Central Command said that last week alone, Palestinians tried smuggling some 10 pipe bombs out of Nablus through the Hawara Checkpoint south of the city.

"The terror here never stops and only grows," one officer said of the West Bank. "The only way to keep it under control is by retaining our presence in the territory."

According to statistics released by the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center at the Center for Special Studies, there were 287 terror attacks, including shootings, Qassam rocket attacks, stabbings and roadside bombs in November, compared to 172 in October, 115 in September and 151 in August.

A ceasefire in the West Bank would most likely mean an end to IDF arrest raids in Palestinian towns, such as the one in Nablus last week during which security forces uncovered a number of stuffed animals filled with explosive charges, IDF sources said.

The sources estimated that in addition to a cessation of military operations, the ceasefire would also include the removal of checkpoints outside some Palestinian cities.

A senior official in the Prime Minister's Office said Saturday night that the security issue was a very important consideration in deciding whether to expand the ceasefire, but other considerations would also be raised at the meeting – including international opinion and the need to relieve the humanitarian situation in the West Bank.

Diplomatic officials said there's a growing sense in some capitals that there is now diplomatic momentum that needs to be harnessed, stemming from the Gaza ceasefire and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Sde Boker speech in which he said Israel would release Palestinian prisoners if the Palestinian Authority complied with the conditions of the ceasefire.

As an indication of the momentum, two foreign ministers – German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier and Austrian Foreign Minister Ursula Plassnik – were to hold talks with Israeli leaders in Jerusalem on Sunday, as was Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief.

While the Plassnik visit was planned well in advance, Solana's and Steinmeier's trips came about as a result of last week's events.

Another indication of international pressure Israel may face to expand the ceasefire despite security concerns, came in an interview U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gave the Al Arabiya television station on Friday.

Rice said that in order to reach U.S. President George W. Bush's two-state vision for the region, "we have to take advantage of openings that we may have, and we have a little opening now."

She said one of the reasons she met Thursday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Olmert was "to talk about the importance of the ceasefire."

Canada to join Holocaust education task force

JTA

BUDAPEST — Canada is participating for the first time in an international task force on Holocaust education, remembrance and research that took place this week in Budapest.

"The Holocaust stands alone in human history for its horrors and its inhumanity," said Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay in announcing the decision.

"It is crucial that we learn from this experience — not simply to ensure 'never again,' but also to build societies based on human dignity where such acts are no longer possible."

The Canadian Jewish Congress praised the government's decision to take part in the three-day task force, which began Sunday.

"We commend the Canadian government for recognizing the significance of this task force, and are extremely heartened by Minister of Foreign Affairs Peter MacKay's strong assertions of the importance to learn from and share the lessons of the Holocaust," said CJC President Ed Morgan.

Created in 1998, the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research consists of representatives of 24 governments as well as governmental and nongovernmental organizations.

Its main purpose is to inspire political and social support for Holocaust education, remembrance and research on a global level.

Birthday Angels help Israeli kids celebrate special day

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There are plenty of ways to support charitable causes in Israel, but Ruthie Sobel Luttenberg believes she's hit on the perfect trifecta for contributors.

Her project not only cements ties between the Jewish Diaspora and Israel, it helps young Israelis feel good about themselves and it offers benefactors the satisfaction of receiving a personal thank you from the Israelis they have supported.

Sobel Luttenberg is founder of Birthday Angels (www.birthday-angels.org), a program that provides a birthday celebration for some of the most disadvantaged youngsters in Israel. An olah from New Jersey who has been in the party business in Israel for some 15 years, she creates birthday kits that she brings to schools to help children celebrate what would otherwise pass as just another day on the calendar.

Ruthie Sobel Luttenberg

Just like Canadian and American youngsters, Israeli kids consider their birthday the most important day of the year. But many families living in poverty don't have the means to really celebrate the event, she said during a recent visit to Toronto.

That's where Birthday Angels steps in. Working in co-operation with the Perach Tutorial Project, a mentoring program of the Weizmann Institute that locates the needy youngsters, Birthday Angels puts together a fun event that includes music, song, decorations and treats.

"I wanted to give the less advantaged [children] the feeling they are important and the centre of the world," she said, "and make the life-cycle event meaningful."

Since she introduced the program in November 2004, she's organized about 2,000 parties across the country.

At the end of the party, the birthday boy or girl fills out a thank you card that is sent back to North American donors.

"The North American donors both give and get. It creates a profound connection and [addresses] important emotional needs of both sides," she said.

Contributors give the Israeli kids – many of whom are from disadvantaged homes or have special needs – "a once-in-a-lifetime experience, empowering them to feel good about themselves and know that people all over the world care about them," she said.

Last summer, Sobel Luttenberg took Birthday Angels north to help kids stuck in bomb shelters celebrate their special day. She personally arranged more than 25 parties in about a month.

"I was in a bomb shelter when a bomb went off during a party," she said. "The building shook and the camera fell off the table."

That was in Tiberias, and the Hezbollah rocket fell just across the street from where the children were enjoying their party. No one was hurt, but "a whole building went down."

The missiles, she said, "were coming every minute. It was quite traumatic."

She plans to bring Birthday Angels next to the kids in Sderot, who are experiencing regular Qassam rocket attacks from Gaza.

Birthday Angels is funded in small part from grants, but the bulk of its funding comes from benefactors around the world. Torontonians are particularly generous, she said, providing about one-third of the organization's budget. One-third is raised in Israel and the final third comes from across the United States.

Altogether, Birthday Angels has raised about $100,000 (US) since 2004.

"It's a low-budget project," Sobel Luttenberg said, noting that she runs it out of her basement.

Contributors in Canada can make a charitable gift through the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science and receive a tax receipt, she added.

While in Toronto, Soble Luttenberg visited several Jewish schools, where she described the program and asked youngsters to consider becoming birthday angels – whether through cash contributions or by earmarking some of their bar or bat mitzvah gifts to the charity.

Ya'alon dodges arrest

Israel's former military chief reportedly avoided a bid to prosecute him on war crimes in New Zealand. Israeli media reported that the Auckland District Court last week issued a warrant for Moshe Ya'alon's arrest on war crimes charges at the behest of pro-Palestinian groups who wanted him tried for a 2002 air strike against a senior terrorist in Gaza that killed 14 civilians. New Zealand's attorney general reportedly overruled the court and rescinded the warrant, and Ya'alon remained in New Zealand to continue with his vacation plans. Several former members of Israel's top military brass have been targeted in private war-crimes lawsuits in foreign courts.

'Free Palestine,' fans say

Fans of the Italian soccer team Livorno unfurled Palestinian flags during a game last week with Maccabi Haifa. They also bore a banner reading "Free Palestine" written in Arabic at the match, which ended in a 1-1 draw. The results enabled Maccabi to advance to the next round of the UEFA Cup European soccer tournament.

Arafat hosted Iranians

The Palestinian Authority agreed in 2002 to host Iran's Revolutionary Guard in exchange for weapons. Ha'aretz quoted Israeli Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz as saying that then-PA president Yasser Arafat made the deal with senior Iranian officials, under which Iranian troops would be stationed in the West Bank and Gaza in exchange for 50 tons of weapons, which were intercepted by Israel as they came in on the Karine A ship. Mofaz said the ship's capture revealed the extent of ties between Arafat and Iran.

Bombers jailed

Egypt sentenced 13 men in connection with a wave of Red Sea resort bombings. An Egyptian security court sentenced three to death, confirming a decree handed down previously by an Egyptian cleric, and the other 10 to between five years and life in prison after convicting them of complicity in suicide bombings between 2004 and 2006. The attacks killed more than 100 people, including 11 Israelis. Several of the attacks targeted resorts frequented by Israeli tourists.

Tutu heads to Gaza

South African Archbishop Desmond Tutu, who has in the past compared Israeli policies with those under apartheid, has been named to head a United Nations fact-finding mission to the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun, where an Israeli artillery barrage killed 19 civilians last month. The Nobel Peace laureate will travel to Gaza to "assess the situation of victims, address the needs of survivors, and make recommendations on ways and means to protect Palestinian civilians against further Israeli assaults," according to the president of the UN Human Rights Council, Luis Alfonso De Alba.

Judge strikes ban on terrorist funding

JTA

LOS ANGELES — A California judge has declared unconstitutional a 2001 presidential order blocking funds for terrorist groups, a decision that could affect funding for Hamas and Hezbollah.

Last week's decision by Los Angeles District Court Judge Audrey Collins applies only to the Tamil Tigers and the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK.

Those parties were named in the case brought against the U.S. government by the Humanitarian Law Project, which wants to allow Americans to raise money for "lawful, non-violent activities" by the groups, the Washington Post reported.

Alykhan Velshi, a lawyer with the Foundation for the Defence of Democracies, told JTA the decision could have a "persuasive" influence on other cases.

Hundreds of terrorist groups, including Hamas, Hezbollah and their affiliates, have been banned from fundraising under the same law used by U.S. President George W. Bush in his presidential order naming the PKK and the Tamil Tigers.

Velshi said his group would likely file an amicus brief if federal authorities appeal.

The foundation has lobbied for inclusion of Hezbollah affiliates on the terrorist list, arguing that allowing money to be raised for terrorists' supposedly "non-violent" activities is ludicrous.

OU may now oppose Israeli gov't

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

JERUSALEM — As Israeli forces mobilized in the summer of 2005 to remove 8,000 settlers from the Gaza Strip, anger mounted among American Orthodox Jews.

Not only was then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon's government relinquishing territory that some viewed as Jewish land by birthright, but many felt the withdrawal was a concession to terrorist intimidation that would invite further bloodshed.

But the Orthodox Union, the largest Orthodox umbrella group in the United States, remained silent, following a longstanding policy of not taking public positions opposed to the security policies of Israel's government.

That policy was reversed last month when the Orthodox Union adopted a resolution at its biennial national convention in Jerusalem empowering its leaders to publicly oppose Israeli government positions if they deem it necessary.

At the end of a four-part resolution on Israel – which expressed, among other things, the union's "historic obligation" to preserve the rights of Jews to live freely throughout the land of Israel and its skepticism about trading land for peace – the OU moved to allow itself to publicly oppose the government in "exceptional circumstances," as determined by the organization's board of directors or executive committee.

The resolution's practical impact may be only to change the focus of debate from whether to dissent publicly to what qualifies as exceptional circumstances.

But its adoption, and the intensity with which delegates argued over seemingly minor distinctions in language and emphasis, reflects a larger generational shift within the union.

"This organization is becoming a lonely place for those who believe in old-fashioned modern Orthodoxy," said David Luchins, a longtime OU board member who opposed the change. "The older generation was influenced by teachers who taught us not to get involved in Israeli issues. The grassroots is not satisfied anymore with that approach."

Proponents of a more robust public posture counter that Orthodox Jews have a religious duty to make their voices heard on issues of consequence for the future of Israel and the Jewish people.

"If you're going to be perceived as the organization that represents Orthodox Judaism in North America, you have an obligation," said Aron Raskas, a Baltimore attorney who chaired the commission that drafted the resolution.

Raskas acknowledged that opposition is sometimes best expressed privately, but said there are moments that call for a more public position.

"Silence is often construed as tacit approval of the policy," he said.

Larry Zeifman, vice-president of OU Canada and a Toronto delegate at the convention, is in favour of the resolution.

He told The CJN that the organization "needs to have a voice to speak on issues of concern to the Orthodox community. It was muzzled before by previous policies on major issues that affect the Orthodox community."

However, he stressed, "this is not an issue about the Orthodox community's support for the State of Israel." He said the Orthodox community is a leader in supporting Israel, as evidenced by visits, sending children to study and live there, and by giving financial assistance.

"We're talking about the Orthodox community being able to speak out on behalf of its constituency, both here and in Israel." He said that not only should the North American Orthodox community have the right to speak out, but that the Orthodox community in Israel looks to them to do so.

Rabbi Reuven Poupko of Montreal's Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation disagrees with Zeifman. "I think [the resolution is] a disappointing reversal of longstanding policy.

He believes the issue goes beyond a generational difference to an idea that developed after the Six Day War in 1967 that there are "two Israels: a religious Israel that we embrace, and a strident secular Israel that we can ignore or even disavow.

"The religious community feels they're not really criticizing [Israel]; they're embracing the authentic Israel. I don't believe you can parse Israel in that way."

Rabbi Baruch Taub of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation of Toronto declined to address the resolution per se, but said that Diaspora Jews "need to approach with humility any public critique of a security related policy" of Israel.

Because Israelis are directly affected by government decisions regarding security and Diaspora Jews are not, Rabbi Taub said, "it is they and they alone who should be involved in formulating Israeli policy. Anyone in the Diaspora who wishes to influence Israeli policy can move to Israel, become a citizen, and vote in elections."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas said he's "of two minds" about the resolution. "I've always been of the mind, if you're going to criticize Israel, do it there, but not in a public manner which is embarrassing to Israel," he said.

However, he added, in the case of the Gaza pullout, the general public didn't comprehend the trauma until they saw it happening.

Most Israelis were in favour of the pullout, he added.

Rabbi Bulka said the careful wording of the OU resolution indicates that it was "obviously a painful thing for them to do. I hope it will never come to a situation where they feel they have to do it."

Longstanding policy changed after extensive debate

He added that the OU is "a significant enough organization that it can get its message to the Israeli government by means that won't embarrass the country."

Diaspora Jewry's role in Israeli decision-making long has been contentious, with many arguing that since Israelis alone bear the consequences of their government's actions, American Jewish organizations have no right to influence them.

But Israel's withdrawal from Gaza, with the spectacle of Jews removing other Jews from their homes, sparked a groundswell of protest in the Orthodox community that severely challenged that view. Raskas called it a "lightning-rod issue" for the Orthodox Union.

At the convention, debate over the union's proper role in Israeli decisions essentially pitted the moralists against the pragmatists – those who believe North American Jewry has an obligation to speak out against those who worry that the costs may outweigh the benefits.

Hillel Halkin, a noted author and translator who participated in a panel discussion on the subject, reminded the group that if it speaks out, other organizations will too. The cumulative effect will be a diminution of American Jewish influence on matters pertaining to Israel, he said.

Americans are just as divided on Israel-related issues as are Israelis, Halkin argued, and a split in the American Jewish community "could nullify its utility as an Israel lobby."

During the question period that followed, it appeared that Halkin's urging had fallen on deaf ears. Virtually every questioner asserted not only a right but a moral imperative to oppose policies they believe put Jewish lives at risk, with many drawing analogies to the period leading up to World War II, when American Jewry was silent in the face of Hitler's rise to power.

"We have to worry what history is going to say about us," said Rabbi Emanuel Feldman, who sat on the panel along with Halkin and OU chairman Harvey Blitz.

Rabbi Feldman suggested that some issues are so morally compelling that they demand a public response, even when the practical effects are nil, or even negative.

The resolution was adopted after debate on several proposed amendments, which differed primarily in the amount of leeway they allowed in determining when to take an opposing position in public.

Cuban community turns 100

By LARRY LUXNER
JTA

MIAMI — As the world focuses its attention on Cuba's ailing President Fidel Castro – who was too sick to attend his own 80th birthday bash in Havana – Cuba's Jews are enjoying a rare celebration of their own.

For the next month, the island's tiny Jewish community will mark its 100th anniversary with religious services, music, dancing, parties and speeches.

The festivities were to begin last Thursday evening with a cultural gala at Havana's National Fine Arts Museum. On Dec. 1, local historian Maritza Corrales was scheduled to present her book, The Chosen Island: Jews in Cuba, at the biblically themed Hotel Raquel in the capital city's historic colonial quarter.

Throughout December, the Emuna dance company performs contemporary Jewish folk dances in the central Cuban city of Santa Clara, while in Santiago de Cuba, the works of Jewish artists will be exhibited at Congregacion Hatikva. The leader of that synagogue, Eugenia Farin Levy, also will present her book, History of Cuba's Jewish Community in Maps.

Some 1,500 Jews live in Cuba, more than 85 per cent of them in Havana, according to Adela Dworin, president of Havana's largest synagogue, the Patronato.

Sources in Miami, however, put the actual number of Jews in Cuba at 600 to 800. They point out that nearly 700 Cuban Jews have left for Israel in the past 10 years, with nearly half of them eventually relocating to south Florida.

Dworin assumed leadership of the Jewish community in March after its longtime president, 80-year-old Jose Miller, died of a heart attack. Miller's grandson, William Miller, 30, is the community's vice-president.

"For us it's very sad not to have Dr. Miller with us because this celebration was his idea," Dworin told JTA in a phone interview from Havana. "The actual centenary of the community was in August, but we had to postpone it after he died."

Jews have been living in Cuba off and on for centuries, but it wasn't until 1906 that 11 American Jews living on the island established a Reform synagogue, the United Hebrew Congregation, with services in English.

They also consecrated a cemetery in Guanabacoa, on the outskirts of Havana, officially marking the start of institutionalized Jewish life in Cuba.

Adele Dworin

By 1959, Cuba had an estimated 15,000 Jews, for the most part wealthy merchants with shoe factories, department stores and mansions. Following Castro's sweeping confiscation of private property, most of the Jews fled to south Florida, with smaller numbers immigrating to Israel and various Latin American countries.

Havana currently has three functioning synagogues, while Camaguey and Santiago de Cuba have one each. In addition, much smaller Jewish communities hold regular Shabbat services at private homes in the provincial capitals of Cienfuegos, Sancti Spiritus and Guantanamo.

Dworin said several prominent rabbis are in Cuba for the festivities, including Chile's Rabbi Samuel Szteinhandler and Rabbi Arthur Schneier, founder of the Appeal of Conscience Foundation. Also set to attend the opening-night commemoration was Caridad Diego, chief of religious affairs of the Cuban Communist Party's Central Committee.

The island-wide event marking 100 years of organized Jewish life in Cuba was supposed to include a visit to the Patronato by Fidel Castro himself. But that had to be cancelled when the bearded leader was rushed to a hospital in late July for emergency surgery of an undisclosed nature. The illness forced Castro to turn power over to his brother Raul, 75, for the first time since 1959.

By coincidence, the Jewish festivities overlap the Communist regime's official commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Cuba's Revolutionary Armed Forces. Yet Castro didn't even make it to a military parade in his honour, telling supporters in a statement read on government-run TV, "It is with great sorrow that I bid you farewell for not being able to personally thank you and embrace every one of you."

Castro has not been seen in public since his surgery. Foreign experts and many Cubans are convinced he has terminal cancer.

"I don't believe this is a moment for celebration," said Moises Asis, an anti-Castro exile living in Miami.

"What's there to celebrate?"

Asis taught Hebrew and led the B'nai Brith Havana chapter before fleeing Cuba in 1992 with his wife and daughter. He told JTA that Jews, like the rest of Cuba's 11.2 million inhabitants, enjoy no basic political or economic freedoms.

"Everything is about money," he said. "Cuba may have the label of a communist country, but the reality is one of brutal capitalism. Workers are exploited more by the Castro regime today than they were in England in the 19th century."

Yet Asis acknowledged that the regime has never been anti-Semitic, despite Castro's vicious criticism of Israel and historic closeness with Palestinian terrorist groups. And private Israeli companies have invested heavily in Cuban citrus and real-estate ventures.

"The discrimination in Cuba is not specifically against Jews but against all religions including Jews," Asis said. "It's true we had some privileges, but the Jewish community was so small and so weak that it would have been very easy for the government to destroy that community if it wanted. When it comes to treatment of Jews, Cuba was one of the most tolerant countries in the Communist world."

The Castro regime has never stopped U.S. or Canadian Jewish organizations from delivering wheelchairs, school supplies and kosher food to the local Jewish community.

Tupelo envies her friends

Hanukkah Counts Too* by Howard Shapiro, illustrated by Dawn M. Landrum, Trafford Publishing For Young Children.

Tupelo doesn't have the Chanukah spirit this year. All her friends are getting ready for Christmas, singing carols and putting up Christmas trees.

It's not fair, Tupelo thinks, why does she have to be different from everybody else?

"I just wished we celebrated Christmas like just about everyone else in the world," she tells her mother, father, brother and cousin, Ron, the cool guy in the dark clothes who wears his sunglasses even in the house. "All we do on Christmas Day is eat at a Chinese restaurant."

Does Tupelo's story sound familiar? Maybe you feel this way, or one of your best friends does?

Just remember what Ron tells Tupelo in Hanukkah Counts Too: "Celebrating a different holiday is nothing to be ashamed of!"

After all, it's got to be a special day. Why else are there 16 different ways to spell Chanukah, or Hanukkah, or Chanuka or – well, you get the picture.

A Menorah for Isaac

Isaac was excited. Morah Amy was coming! He hadn't seen her since last Tuesday. Usually she came twice a week, but last time she didn't come because she thought she was coming down with a cold. And Isaac couldn't be exposed to anyone sick. Even though he was out of the hospital and feeling strong enough to go back to school, they were still injecting him with medicine, strong burning medicine to blast disease out of his body. Medicine that made his body weak and defenceless, and even if he caught as little as a cold, he would have to go back to the hospital. That's why he wasn't in school. With so many kids there, it was too dangerous. So instead of school, Morah Amy came to his house and taught him twice a week.

And today they were going to make a menorah for Chanukah!

"Isaac," his Mom called, "Morah Amy's here!"

Isaac ran to the door. Morah Amy was talking with his mother, but as soon as she saw Isaac, she burst out, "Isaac! It's so good to see you! How have you been?"

"How have I been?" he thought. "I hate being home. I miss camp so much. I wish I was back in school. I was feeling fine, and they made me take these tests and told me I'm sick again, and now I have to take all these awful medicines. I don't even know if it's worth it."

But he couldn't tell Morah Amy that, so he just said, "I'm okay, I guess. Are we making a menorah today?"

"Of course." She lifted the shopping bag she was holding. "I have the clay, and you have the talent to make a really nice menorah. Right?"

In no time, they were around the table, pounding down the bricks of clay, rolling and shaping, while Morah Amy talked about menorahs and Chanukah.

"Yuck!" exclaimed Isaac, proudly showing off his dirty hands. "This is great."

"So, what kind of menorah do you want to make?"

"A real tall one. With branches coming out of the middle. Like the one in the Beit Hamikdash."

"I don't know if that's a good idea. Before it dries, it will bend very easily, and even when it's done, it will be very fragile. How about a flat menorah. Like this."

She rolled a pudgy cylinder out of the clay, and beat it down. "I'll make it a little higher here for the shamash."

Isaac followed her lead.

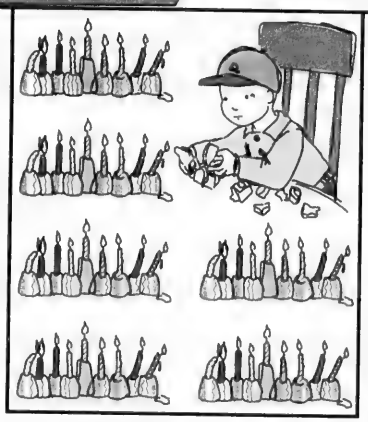
"Now we have to make holes for the candles," continued Morah Amy, picking up a pencil.

"One, two three…" Isaac poked holes, trying to keep them the same distance from each other.

"Wow, Isaac, that's beautiful. I can't wait to see you use it on Chanukah."

MATCHING

Can you find the two menorahs that are exactly alike?



"Now what?"

"Well, now we have to let it dry. And then I'll fire it in a kiln — meaning I'll bake it in a special hot oven, and then we can paint it. Then we'll fire it again. And then it's ready!"

"When will it dry? In an hour?"

"No, clay takes longer than that to dry. A week. Maybe. I hope. We really should have started this last week, but it wasn't possible." She sighed. "But we'll see. Hopefully it will dry in time."

But when she came back a week later, Isaac could tell something was wrong.

"Is my menorah ready to paint?" he asked.

"I'm so sorry Isaac, but your menorah broke."

"What?"

"I put it in the kiln hoping it was dry enough. I guess it wasn't. It cracked, and broke into pieces. I feel terrible."

She looks like she's about to cry. It's not that bad! "Oh. So could we glue it together?"

"Glue? I don't think…maybe. Maybe."

"You have the pieces with you?"

"In my car…I didn't want to show them to you."

A minute later Morah Amy was back. She was right. The menorah was in really bad shape, lying in small fragments.

It was like a hard puzzle, but worse because it was 3-D. Hard, but he would do it.

"It sticks up here, this must be part of the shamash. No, it doesn't fit."

"Try turning it the other way."

"No…oh! It fits! Now where does this go?"

"Remember where the holes were."

"Right…got it!"

It took over an hour, but finally the menorah again stood, intact.

Morah Amy beamed. "So now we'll glue it."

"No, now we paint. You told me that you have to put it in the oven again after you paint it. Then we'll glue it."

"But then we'll have to take it apart and put it together again."

"Okay, I can do that. I kind of remember how it goes together. Plus, I'll paint it with different colour stripes, so it will be easy to tell what goes where. I hope you brought the paint with you."

"I didn't..."

"And it's almost time for you to go already. I don't understand. It's like you gave up on my menorah. My parents, the doctors — everyone's telling me never to give up, to keep fighting no matter what happens. I don't always feel that way, but that's what I have to do.

"And you told me that's what Chanukah's all about — how we didn't give up, even when there seemed to be no hope. And that's why God made the miracle and the oil burned for eight days. To show us if you try your hardest God will help you."

Morah Amy put her arms around Isaac and hugged him close. She didn't say anything for a long time.

Finally she said, "I'm going to my house to get the paint now. We'll paint your menorah, however long it takes. And then we'll fire it. And glue it. You'll have a beautiful menorah for Chanukah. Because you never give up."

Comedians Kenny and Spenny revel in their 'Heb-i-ness'

By BYRON PASCOE and PAUL TELNER
Special to The CJN

In the hit reality comedy series Kenny vs. Spenny, two Jewish friends from Toronto battle each other in outrageous competitions, with the loser having to perform a humiliating stunt that the winner chooses.

Competitions in the show, which airs in 40 countries and is in its third season, have included the contests "who can wear a dead octopus on their head the longest?" and "who can imitate the other guy better?"

While Kenny (Kenny Hotz) will have us believe that he's won most of the competitions on the series, which began on CBC before moving to Showcase, Spenny (Spencer Rice) attributes many of those "wins" to cheating.

Spenny says the good guy can't win by playing fair. "One of the reasons why I get up in the morning to have my brain smashed out by Kenny is that we are documenting that reality... People love the character [mobster] Tony Soprano, yet he is a scumbag. Our show can let people see the result of what a Machiavellian manipulator like Kenny can do to me, and at that point, I become a microcosm of society."

Kenny and Spenny have some fun with mouse traps.

Kenny believes he wins more often because he's smarter and thinks outside the box. "If you watch a couple episodes, you want me to lose, but then after watching the third show, everybody wants him [Spenny] to get crushed," he says.

"Why? Spenny is wound up, stressed out, short-fused, paranoid and neurotic. He's got traits that everybody hates. I'm fun loving, happy and very social. He's anti-social and has that goody-two-shoes thing going. He's like a religious fundamentalist that I love to squash."

They both admit that they exaggerate their natural tendencies on the TV show.

They see Judaism as pivotal parts of their lives, at least comically. "We were going to do a competition of 'who's the better Jew?' but last year we did 'who do the older ladies like more?' and went out with three bubbies. I loved it," Kenny says.

"With [comedians] Woody Allen and Larry David, there aren't many people who are revelling in their 'Heb-i-ness' as much as us. The CBC called us 'Whine and Shyster.' I'm a Jew from Toronto. I can't avoid my 'Jew-i-ness' from infiltrating everything I do. I get my devious diabolical skills from my Uncle Abe in Hamilton. Places I've gone in my entire life pepper the show, from the JCC to Bagel World."

Spenny attended a private school that was filled with gentiles, he says. "My humour wasn't appreciated. It was only when I started playing hockey with Jewish kids at Forest Hill [Collegiate] that the impact of my personality was felt amongst my peers.

"It was a matter of being understood. Jews have a great sense of humour, which definitely isn't exclusive – maybe it's a type of humour, I don't know."

They've done several films apart, including Spenny's Telewhore, about a 300-pound female phone-sex operator, and Kenny's The Papal Chase, about his attempts to meet the Pope. Together they made It Don't Cost Nothin' To Say Good Morning, a film about a lovable hobo.

Their film Pitch documented Kenny and Spenny trying to sell a film in Hollywood. It featured cameos by movie critic Roger Ebert and actor Al Pacino and was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival.

"We were a unique, modern-classic comedy duo, which is the straight man, me, and the crazy guy, Kenny," Spenny says. "What made it fresh was that we weren't put together at the studios like Laurel and Hardy. We grew up together and are real."

Kenny says: "We decided we would do what most Jews in comedy do. Going to L.A. from Canada is kind of like leaving Egypt and going to the land of Canaan. You have to do it whether you want it or not – it's the natural progression for Jewish comedians."

The two continue to be close friends, as they have been for as long as they can remember. "Everyone can look into their life and see the one friend that they have known longer than anyone else," Spenny says. "No matter how different you are from them, you are kind of stuck with them, kind of like family. Almost to a complete extent, that's what Kenny and I are."

Showcase airs Kenny vs. Spenny Thursdays at 9:30 p.m. and Saturdays at 9 p.m. The show "features many challenges too racy to be mentioned in The CJN, but a fit for their network, which prides itself as being 'television without borders,'" Spenny says.

"Showcase is our ultimate home. I don't think there is a broadcaster in the entire world that would be as forgiving and understanding of our insanity."

Three Tenors to perform at Beth Tzedec

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Break out your opera glasses and brush up on your knowledge of Puccini and Verdi, because the three tenors are coming to town.

No, not "those" three tenors, rather, the Three Tenors from the Holy Land; Yevgeni (the Israeli Pavarotti) Shapovalov, Vladislav Goray and Felix Livshitz.

On Tuesday, Dec. 12, 8 p.m., at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Israel's foremost tenor soloists will grace the air of Toronto with their world-renowned voices.

The three are longtime friends, dating back to the days when they studied together at the music conservatory in Odessa, Ukraine, said Svetlana Dvoretskaia, who is producing the show through her Show One Entertainment company.

Toronto is the only Canadian stop on their 10-city, two-week tour.

The Shapovalov-inspired, three-tenor format has been a success from the outset, with the tenors selling out more than 100 shows in 18 months of touring.

"They always thought about doing [a tour] like this," Dvoretskaia said. "This was planned for a long time."

Aside from his golden voice, Shapovalov, who has a charismatic stage presence, often speaks and jokes with the crowd, playing the showman, said Dvoretskaia.

"He's a big guy, and as soon as he comes out on the stage, he's the most charming guy for audiences," she said. "He has one of the best relationships with his audience. It will be a different type of show… it will be fun."

Though Shapovalov may be the marquee name for the event, both Goray, a soloist with the Israeli opera, and Livshitz, a regular performer with the Israeli Philharmonic, are more than capable of bringing the house down with their talents.

Expect the tenors to sing a variety of songs from their vast repertoire.

"There will be songs familiar to everyone," Dvoretskaia said. "They never tell you what they're gonna do. They [judge] by the audience in front of them. But Toronto will probably get a variety of Italian, Russian, Jewish and Spanish songs."

Though they could have played in a bigger venue, the tenors and Show One Entertainment chose the Beth Tzedec for its acoustic properties and "to emphasize the Jewishness of this performance," Dvoretskaia said.

The synagogue has a capacity of 2,500.

Half of the profits from the concert will be donated to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2007 Israel Emergency Campaign.

"People should know that while this will be a fantastic show to attend, they will also be helping Israel," Dvoretskaia said.

I Have Never Forgotten You chronicles legendary Nazi hunter

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Simon Wiesenthal, the late Nazi hunter, modestly described himself as a "researcher."

Technically, he was right. As director of the Jewish Documentation Center in Vienna, he immersed himself in the minutiae of keeping track of Nazi war criminals who had eluded justice after the Holocaust. But on a much deeper level, Wiesenthal – a survivor whose mother perished in the Belzec extermination camp –was far more than a researcher.

He was a skilled and dogged investigator and lobbyist who made sure that their names were in the news and who insistently pressed for their imprisonment. Thanks to his persistence, a succession of important Nazi killers were captured, from Adolf Eichmann, the "engineer" of the Final Solution, to Franz Stangl, the commandant of Treblinka and Sobibor.

"This man played a major role in bringing to justice the murderers of 4½ million Jews," said Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, in Toronto last week.

Rabbi Hier was here to introduce the centre's new biopic, I Have Never Forgotten You: The Life and Legacy of Simon Wiesenthal, which had its Canadian premiere at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Directed by Richard Trank and narrated by actress Nicole Kidman, this documentary unfolds through the medium of file footage, mainly in interviews with Wiesenthal, his associates and his daughter, Paulinka Kriesberg.

The film, which is likely to be sold to television networks and be available on DVD, opens with a sweeping shot of the quarry in the Mauthausen concentration camp, where many inmates died and where Wiesenthal was incarcerated. He weighed a skeletal 99 pounds, and was reduced to eating grass, when he was liberated by American forces on May 5, 1945.

I Have Never Forgotten You, a reference to his dedication to remembering the six million killed during the Holocaust, glosses over his birthplace in Buczacz, his youth in Galicia and his training as a building engineer. Indeed, this segment is rather dull.

Simon Wiesenthal

The documentary only picks up momentum when it focuses on Wiesenthal's hunt for the Nazis who had not paid for their respective crimes. Among them were Karl Silberbauer, the Gestapo officer who arrested Anne Frank, and Hermine Braunsteiner-Ryan, the Long Island hausfrau who was implicated in the murder of hundreds of children in Majdanek.

The film also touches on a variety of related issues: Wiesenthal's futile attempt to ascertain whether Raoul Wallenberg – the Swedish saviour of 100,000 Hungarian Jews – was still alive after falling into the hands of the Soviet Union; Wiesenthal's monumental row with the Jewish chancellor of Austria, Bruno Kreisky; Wiesenthal's successful crusade to extend Germany's Statute of Limitations; Wiesenthal's unsuccessful efforts to rein in the so-called Angel of Death, Joseph Mengele; and Wiesenthal's controversial position on Kurt Waldheim, the Austrian president accused of being a Nazi war criminal.

Trank does not address accusations, levelled by a former head of the Mossad, that Wiesenthal falsely took credit for Eichmann's capture. Aside from this omission, the film is comprehensive. It also possesses a delicious sense of irony. When Wiesenthal turned 90, he was feted at the Hotel Imperial, Adolf Hitler's favourite haunt in Vienna.

Israeli songstress stays true to dream

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

One minute into Ronit Ofir Engel's 2006 debut album, Poetry of the Brilliant Silence, she shouts the following words, "Wake up call to the universe! 911!"

It is a fitting start to an album that is all about challenges, both her own and the world's.

Now living in Toronto, the 28-year-old Israeli-born singer/actor/poet has experienced her share of triumph and heartbreak on the road to her ultimate dream: a full-fledged music career.

Since coming to North America in 2000, she has had a record deal gone bad and dealt with broken promises and numerous delays in her recording.

But she remains undaunted.

"God puts stones in your way. But you have to give back to receive," she said.

Poetry of the Brilliant Silence

In 2004, she recorded The Passion Show, a European dance hit single that placed in the Top 5 of VH-1's Pop Song of the Year contest.

She also lived in New York for one year to try out her acting chops.

Ronit Ofir Engel
[Dario Roberto Quintos photo]

While there, Ofir, as she prefers to be called nowadays, managed to get bit parts in various productions, and worked as an extra on several projects including the hit TV shows, Sex and the City, MTV Jam and on film in The Yards.

She spent time bouncing between Israel and North America before finally settling in Toronto in 2004.

Though she is now waiting for Canadian citizenship, Ofir never forgets where she came from and what Israel means to her.

Born in Nahariya, she always felt she had something to share with the world.

"When you grow up in Israel, you always worry about what you can do for your country and not yourself," she said. "But when you grow up and leave, travel… then you can focus."

Still, she has sacrificed much to be here.

When this summer's war with Hezbollah began, Ofir chose to stay in Toronto to finish Poetry of the Brilliant Silence and work on her follow-up album, The Passion Show, rather than visit her ailing mother in Israel.

She didn't know how great an emotional cost that decision would exact.

Two months later, in September, her mother died of complications due to diabetes, which left Ofir heartbroken, but also determined.

"I don't know if she knew she was going to die," Ofir said. "But I spoke with her just days before [her passing] and she told me, 'I know you can do it. I know you're going to be successful.'"

Personal loss served to reinvigorate her musical ambitions, and she set about recording The Passion Show, with plans to release it before year's end.

In order to do so, Ofir works hard to make ends meet.

She performs gigs around town, often for charitable causes such as Kids Play Youth Outlook, and auditions for acting roles, "[W]hatever comes until I can get the music career on track," she said.

That path is now set firmly toward pop music.

Where Poetry of the Brilliant Silence focused on Ofir's enigmatic poetry and psychedelic imagery, The Passion Show will highlight her mainstream abilities.

"The Passion Show is totally the other side of me," she said. "There's one side that is [highbrow] and the other side is playful and fun."

Ofir is careful to assert limits on what she will and won't do in this next phase of her career.

"I will maintain my values by staying in the middle [ground]," she said. "I won't go sleazy, but I know how to be sexy or cute. This really separates me from a lot of artists these days."

Once she is done working on The Passion Show, Ofir will seek out musical collaborators.

She has a copious backlog of songs and poems, all ready to be recorded.

"I have enough work [to keep] a producer occupied from here until doomsday," she said.

The U.S.-Saudi relationship: 'oil for security'

Thicker Than Oil: America's Uneasy Partnership With Saudi Arabia by* Rachel Bronson, Oxford University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

What does the United States – a bastion of democracy and freedom – have in common with a dyed-in-the-wool theocracy like Saudi Arabia?

Rachel Bronson, an American scholar, addresses this pertinent question in her thoroughly researched and informative book, Thicker Than Oil: America's Uneasy Partnership With Saudi Arabia.

Rachel Bronson

The title is a giveaway, of course. This extremely conservative desert kingdom, which has funded and promoted Islamic radicalism, sits astride one-quarter of the world's proven oil reserves, a fact that Washington can hardly ignore.

Saudi Arabia is also important geo-politically, being close to Iraq and Iran, two of the hot spots in the Middle East, and Israel, one of Washington's closest allies in the region.

Bronson, the director of Middle East Studies at the influential Council on Foreign Relations, sums up the United States' relationship with Saudi Arabia in three telling words: "oil for security." In exchange for facilitating the unhindered flow of oil at reasonable prices, the U.S. guarantees Saudi Arabia's territorial integrity. For the past half century, Washington has defended the Saudis from external threats posed by the former Soviet Union, Egypt, Iraq, Iran and, now, Al Qaeda.

Despite this marriage of convenience, Washington's alliance with Israel and Saudi Arabia's on-again, off-again support of Muslim extremists have produced serious differences.

As Bronson suggests, Washington's intense interest in Saudi Arabia goes back to 1932, when a major American company struck oil in neighbouring Bahrain. Convinced that black gold was also to be found in Saudi Arabia, American prospectors converged on that backwater. The Saudis were only too glad to work with the United States, which, unlike Britain, was untainted by the brush of western colonialism.

From 1944 to 1950, the production of crude pumped by Aramco – the preeminent American oil company in the kingdom – jumped from 21,000 to 548,000 barrels per day.

Recognizing Saudi Arabia's potential importance, U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt met the Saudi king, Abdel Aziz bin Abdel Rahman al-Faisal al-Saud, in the winter of 1945 aboard the USS Quincy, anchored in the Great Bitter lake adjacent to the Suez Canal.

During much of World War II, the Saudis remained neutral though partial toward the Allies, but in the wake of Roosevelt's congenial meeting with Abdel Aziz; the bond betweeen the United States and Saudi Arabia was forged.

Even so, the king warned Roosevelt that "the heavens will split" and "the earth will be rent asunder" if Jews established a state in Palestine. Roosevelt took his warning under advisement, promising Abdel Aziz never to do anything that might prove hostile to Arabs. Roosevelt died a few months later, his pledge a dead letter. The United States, contrary to Saudi Arabia's position, supported the partition of Palestine and recognized the newly created State of Israel.

Nonetheless, the Cold War drew the United States and Saudi Arabia together. Roosevelt's successor, Harry Truman, initiated a series of military agreements designed to keep the Soviet Union at bay. Bronson fills in the details in voluminous fashion.

The kingdom's relations with the United States reached a nadir in the early 1960s when the new president, John F. Kennedy, announced his intention to cultivate "modernizing" Arab states such as Egypt, which was at odds with Saudi Arabia over a number of issues.

When the Six Day War erupted, the Saudis joined the Arab oil embargo against the United States. With the outbreak of the Yom Kippur War, U.S.-Saudi relations hit a new low as Saudi Arabia orchestrated a much longer embargo. In Bronson's judgment, it was the worst-ever crisis in their relationship.

The Saudis did more than just cut off the flow of oil during the 1973 Arab-Israeli war. They sent an army brigade to assist Syria, but their 3,000 troops did not reach Damascus until after the end of the war. The tardy arrival of the Saudis may have been deliberate, but by that juncture, Saudi Arabia was a vital backer of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Although the United States and Saudi Arabia were not always on the same page on key policy issues, Washington was always receptive to Saudi arms requests. In 1978, in the face of Israeli opposition, the Carter administration pushed through the sale of 60 F-15 fighter jets to Saudia Arabia, while allowing Israel to buy 15. Some years later, during the Reagan presidency, the Saudis were permitted to purchase a fleet of reconnaissance aircraft and F-15 upgrades.

Saudi Arabia, though officially at war with Israel, has promoted two peace plans, both of which the Israeli government has rejected out of hand.

The 1982 Fez plan offered recognition of Israel after its acceptance of a Palestinian state and its withdrawal to the pre-1967 armistice lines. The 2002 plan, presented at the height of the second Palestinian uprising, offered full normalization with Israel in return for Palestinian statehood and a resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem.

According to Bronson, the second intifadah was a high-priority matter for the Saudis, but to their dismay, the Bush administration seemed disengaged from it.

With the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979 and the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in 1990, Washington's co-operation with Saudi Arabia reached new heights.

Working closely with the Americans to repel the Soviets, Saudi Arabia placed huge sums of money at the disposal of Afghan rebels battling the Red Army. Some of these fighters were Islamic fundamentalists who subsequently formed the core of the Taliban regime, a sponsor of Al Qaeda.

The first Gulf War in 1991 marked another high-water point in U.S.-Saudi relations, but it prompted a Saudi national and Al Qaeda leader named Osama bin Laden to turn against the House of Saud once and for all. Saudi Arabia's implicit support of the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq widened the gap between the regime and local Islamic militants, which the authorities had coddled.

The Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States, spearheaded by 15 Saudi militants, fundamentally changed the tone of Washington's relationship with the kingdom. But since then, the Saudis have taken credible measures to stamp out Islamic militancy.

In conclusion, Bronson writes that oil will remain crucially important to Washington's partnership with the Saudis. As of three years ago, Saudi Arabia was America's second largest supplier, shipping 1.4 million barrels per day.

In her view, the relationship can only work if the Saudis continue cracking down on Islamic radicalism and play a leadership role in perpetuating "a more positive interpretation of Islam."

In the meantime, Thicker Than Oil remains a useful and instructive primer about a pivotal Mideastern relationship.

Food critic from Toronto picks TV's 'top chefs'

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

It's true: Gail Simmons likes her mashed potatoes. It's a strange food pick from a judge on TV's Top Chef, and in light of her day job at Food & Wine magazine. But she says her professional experience hasn't spoiled her tastes.

"Although it may not appear this way on Top Chef, I am actually a very easy-going eater. I love all food as long as it is made with a little soul – be it caviar, chips or chicken wings," she admits.

The second season of Top Chef premièred on Bravo in the United States and the first season of Top Chef was featured on the Food Network Canada recently. On the show, the culinary master who bests 15 other chefs in various challenges is dubbed "top chef," and wins $100,000.

'Judge' maintains her love for old-fashioned comfort foods

Simmons is joined at the judging table by actress Padma Lakshmi and Tom Colicchio, co-founder of New York City's Gramercy Tavern and Craft Restaurants, who returns as head chef-judge for the new season.

"Versatility is a skill that can never be underestimated," Simmons wrote in a recent blog entry. "Pairing artichokes with snails and American cheese, or chicken livers with frog legs and peanut butter definitely woke everyone up!" she says of one particular challenge.

Simmons, who grew up in Toronto, transported herself to New York about seven years ago to follow her passions.

Though sometimes, even in the city that seems to have everything, she feels a desire for home. Missing family, inexpensive Thai or Greek food, and public health care, she says are among the drawbacks of New York. "Lack of space, trees, privacy, quiet," are also some complaints of being in the city that never sleeps.

Before taking bites in the Big Apple, however, her interest in food preparation began with a soupçon of basic cooking as an undergraduate at McGill University. Eventually, she wrote restaurant reviews for the student paper, the McGill Tribune.

Still, this was never something she thought could be a career. Her first job out of school was as an editorial intern at Toronto Life magazine. It was there, with the encouragement of former food editor Michael Totzke and food critic James Chatto, that she found herself drawn to food journalism.

"I was an anthropology major and loved how tactile and satisfying it seemed – it was this whole microcosm of culture that encompassed so much else – art, science, politics," she says.

A year later, she moved to New York to attend culinary school – formerly Peter Kump's New York Cooking School and now called Institute of Culinary Education. This gave her the foundation she needed to move forward seriously with food writing.

"My perception of food and cooking has definitely changed over the years simply by constantly being around it, learning about its evolution and coming to understand the work that goes into it," she says.

"I am no doubt more conscious about food and how it goes from raw product to plate than I was 10 years ago, and probably spend more time than most considering what that means to the planet, our bodies, our society."

Simmons worked her way through kitchen apprenticeships at Le Cirque 2000 and Vong Restaurants in New York City, then moved to Vogue magazine, where for two years she worked as a research and recipe-testing assistant to food critic Jeffrey Steingarten. For the past three years, she's been with Food & Wine's special projects, and, most recently, became a TV-show food judge.

Gail Simmons

But make no mistake – when the cameras are off, the chef's hat comes off, and she enjoys the food she eats like anyone else.

"When I go out to eat with friends and family, that is, not on the job, I never analyze or judge the food. At those times I am off duty. Eating or cooking is much more about shared experience, social interaction and pleasure than it is about critique. Besides, I would never be invited to anyone's home for dinner if I thought otherwise."

As for her own family's home cooking in Toronto, she notes that her mother was a food writer for the Globe & Mail years ago and was an influence on her, as far as the culinary arts go. Still, she maintains her adoration for old-fashioned comfort foods.

"My favourite food growing up was probably mashed potatoes or anything creamy and mashed for that matter. But my mother will tell you that I was weaned on leek quiche and pâté," she says. "I still love anything mashed, but I also have a weakness for anything pickled, smoked or spicy. I love to cook soups, stews and braised meat. They are just as comforting to cook as they are to eat."

When the Jewish festivals come around, Simmons is especially delighted to be home, enjoying traditional Jewish cuisine.

"I love all holiday food. I love everything at the Passover Seder table. I love Shabbat dinner at my mom's house – something I cherish now more than ever since I do not get home for it often enough. She still makes the best matzah balls. But I am slowly catching up. My brisket is a force to be reckoned with."

Meanwhile, as season two of Top Chef approaches its finale, was there anything about the show that was the biggest thrill?

"The entire show has been exciting for me. It has proven to us just how important a place food has in pop culture. Top Chef viewers, like our readers [Food & Wine magazine's], are so passionate and have really embraced it," she says.

"They love seeing young, creative people live their dreams and succeed, which is not an easy thing to do in the restaurant business. It had also been a thrill to judge on the show alongside so many extraordinary culinary talents."

It didn't hurt that the show featured both exotic foods and exotic locales.

Simmons managed to steal away a few moments for this interview during the filming of the season two finale, in Hawaii. "I have to admit, that is pretty exciting, too!" she says.

Balancing your wheel of life

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin Librach

A beautiful word in the English language is "balance," but it's a word that eludes many of us because we are so busy in our chaotic world of schedules, commitments and demands on our time and energy.

As parents, we want to give everything to our children, so we sign them up for ballet, gymnastics, hockey, karate, skating and after-school swimming programs. We also want to devote time to our marriage, relationships, career, family, friends and the community – and while it is often a happy problem, sometimes it can be overwhelming. At those times, the need to restore balance becomes very significant.

So how do we know when an out-of-whack period is really becoming an out-of-whack way of life? Well, a great way to look at how balanced your life is, is to do the Wheel of Life Exercise created by authors Laura Whitworth, Henry Kinsey-House and Phil Sandal in Co-Active Coaching.

Here's how it works: there's a wheel with eight wedges, representing Career, Money, Health, Friends and Family, Significant Other, Spirituality and Growth, Fun and Recreation, and Your Physical Environment. What I do, is ask my clients to tell me, on a scale from one to 10, how deeply satisfied they are with each wedge in the wheel. Inevitably, there are wedges in the wheel that will get a lower number, and this often signifies that the wheel is out of balance, and in that particular area, there is a need for some alignment.

For instance, if someone gives a four to health and fitness, it would suggest that this is an area they might want to work on. What's great about this exercise is that it becomes a very powerful visual map of your life, because you can see what is working and what is not. Then you can actually begin to brainstorm and create new ways of figuring out how tackle the area that is not feeling balanced.

The problem for many of us is that we have so many things we feel we must do, things that people expect of us, but there are also things that look too good to pass up. One of the most empowering skills to learn is the ability to say "no" to the myriad of choices and offers that are always being presented to us. Saying "no" to social engagements, to overtime at work, or even to some recreation, will help restore some balance. Learning to say "no" is a way to honour our values.

As we all know, by saying "yes" to working late hours, we are saying "no" to family time and to more rest and relaxation. But we worry that the word "no" isn't polite, or that it means we're not a team player. But, in fact, learning to say "no" is a valuable skill that actually means saying "yes" to something and "no" to something else. Saying "no" creates a choice, and that is very freeing. What we normally do is say "yes" first, and then we worry and stress about it later.

Whenever we see an area that's out of balance, that's often the area that needs the most attention and action. Brainstorm with a friend, a coach or your spouse, and come up with some new and creative ideas of what you can do that will help you achieve more balance.

A great question to ask is what do you want more of in your life and what do you want less of? Then all you have to do is take some action and ask yourself how you can turn that number 1 on your wheel of life into a triumphant 10.

Balance is beautiful when we achieve it. Think of the ballerina on point shoes, or the acrobat balancing on a thin wire. When we achieve balance, life takes on a natural feeling of rhythm, harmony and grace.

Fertility clinic operates according to Halachah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Couples who are desperate to have children may resort to expensive and invasive high-tech methods to conceive, when there are more holistic options, asserts embryologist and fertility expert Dr. Baruch Brooks.

"Every couple has a different issue," Brooks said. "It may be a question not of what to do [to help them], but how to help them."

Brooks is an embryologist and religious supervisor for the IVF Unit at Shaare Zedek Medical Center, and is very involved with the pre-implantation genetics program, with the responsibility of performing biopsies on embryos before they are implanted. As well, he heads a fertility clinic in Jerusalem, Zir Chemed, with its own lab, that operates according to halachic principles.

He was in Toronto for a lecture at the Sephardic Kehila Centre and for private consultations.

While he treats anyone who needs help, as a member of the haredi community, haredim are a major focus of his work. "Many haredim feel distanced from the general community," he said, adding that they have a different way of dealing with problems, particularly personal ones like fertility.

"They would speak to their rabbi before going to a doctor," he said. Some don't realize that there are ways of dealing with the issue that are in accordance with halachic rules, he said. Similarly, medical personnel who are not haredi don't understand their attitude of the primacy of Halachah.

There are even some, he said, who have the attitude that since conception is a matter between the husband, the wife and God, who are we to interfere with the natural order of things.

Brooks can offer them a chance of having a child, or even having more children than they already have, the latter being often not understood as being important or even worth doing.

"I'm a scientist, not a medical doctor," Brooks said. "I advise and look for options." He said that he feels that his role is to help couples get pregnant, not fit them into some standard program. For instance, if a woman ovulates during the time she cannot, according to Halachah, have relations, there are hormones that can be given to alter her ovulation time period. "Sometimes it's a very simple thing that can make the difference," he said.

That being said, he added, he only suggests hormones or other options if they are needed. He feels, he said, that people who just need a little help should get the same attention as those who need in-vitro fertilization techniques.

Brooks emphasized that he is by no means averse to using IVF if necessary. People should be aware, though, that IVF is not without its own risks, such as birth defects. "With natural conception, there is a two to 2½ per cent chance of birth defects, while with IVF, the chance rises to 3½ to four per cent. It should be used only when there is no other option."

Zir Chemet, where Brooks heads the laboratory, offers professional and emotional counselling, information for rabbis and medical personnel and a fertility clinic, all strictly according to Halachah. There are haredi female obstetrician/gynecologists, for those who feel uncomfortable with male OBGYNs.

Women's team to skate as Israel Maccabees in tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Esther Silver already has a full-time job as a doctor, but if her efforts of the last few months are any indication, she could probably enjoy a second career as a hockey scout and recruiter.

Silver has beaten the bushes, torn up the phone lines, and done pretty well everything she could short of driving to Moosonee to scout a game in order to uncover hidden gems – at least she hopes they're gems – in the unlikeliest of categories: Jewish women hockey players.

Her goal is to put together the Israel Maccabees entry in the Canadian Women's Multicultural Hockey Championships (CWMHC).

Nineteen players from across Canada, and even a few playing south of the border, have been recruited for the Maccabees, who will play in the late December tournament against teams representing European, Japanese, Chinese, Ojibwa and Iroquois communities.

The tournament is the brainchild of television executive producer Stanley Papulkas, who has been working behind the scenes to establish the Canadian Multicultural Hockey League (CMHL). His purpose is to permit Toronto's ethnic communities to celebrate their diversity in the most Canadian of ways – with a hockey tournament, according to the CJMHL's Web site (www.cmhl.ca).

In addition to the women's tournament, 16 men's teams representing various ethnic communities in the Toronto area will compete for the newly established "Canadian Cup."

Corporate sponsors include Crown Royal, Rogers' OMNI Television Network, Coffee Time and Metohos, as well as Hockey Canada and the Hockey Hall of Fame.

Silver, herself a goalie, has been at the forefront of organizing an Israeli women's hockey team to wear that country's colours in International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) tournaments. As part of that effort, she has identified several eligible players, but under the CWMHC rules, she has been able to expand her net to take in Jewish women who would not be eligible to play for Israel. At the top of her list are goaltender Daniella Winkler and centre Amy Davidovich, both skilled players who will be expected to lead the Maccabees.

"We have at least seven A-level" players, Silver said, "and they are very excited. One wants to play Hatikvah [Israel's national anthem] in the dressing room."

An Israel Maccabee getting ready for the Canadian Women's Multicultural Hockey Championships.

The team will be coached by Doug Antoine, a hockey instructor who works with Davidovich and who has volunteered his time, Silver said.

It looks like his work will be cut out for him. Silver has faced off against the aboriginal teams and she rates them as tournament favourites.

"I played with them, and they're so amazing," she said.

Compounding Antoine's problems is that the players are so spread out and busy with work and exams that they will be hard-pressed to play together before the first puck drops.

Silver is attempting to arrange a pre-tournament exhibition series with the Chinese team to develop team cohesion and perhaps aid in cutting the roster down to a more manageable 14 players, plus two spares.

Silver, who plans to move to Israel part time, said at least six members of the Maccabees are also eligible to play for the Israeli national women's team (www.niwih.com).

Although the women's national team has yet to play a meaningful game, Silver hopes Israel will be able to ice a team at an IIHF tournament in the spring of 2007.

However, the program in the Jewish State has suffered a a setback due to last summer's war with Hezbollah. A planned hockey camp in the Canada Cup rink in Metulla, which sits on the Lebanon border, was cancelled and a shipment of six bags of badly needed hockey equipment ended up gathering dust in Modiin, Silver said.

Even now, with the end of hostilities, the Olympic-sized rink in the Canada Centre remains closed because it's too costly to operate. The centre's smaller rink is open, however, and eight women players use it for drills and games. Another five skaters are located in central Israel.

Israel's best domestic player, Lisa Horowitz, has earned a hockey scholarship in Finland and will travel to the Scandinavian country next year to further develop her skills. She'll be in Toronto later this months for the tournament.

Silver said hockey players in Israel are badly in need of equipment, and any donations would be appreciated. She can be reached online at dresthersilver@rogers.com.

Weider retires from bodybuilding organization he founded

MONTREAL — After 60 years as president of the International Federation of Bodybuilding and Fitness (IFBB), Ben Weider has officially retired from the international amateur sport governing body he founded and has led since 1946.

The announcement came at the IFBB International Congress in Ostrava, Czech Republic, when Weider addressed delegates from 63 countries by video. Weider said he would remain available to assist the new president, executive council and national federations.

Rafael Santonja of Madrid, Spain, was unanimously elected the new IFBB President. Santonja has served as Weider's executive assistant since 1985.

Santonja's first official act was to nominate Weider as honorary life president. The congress unanimously approved the nomination, giving Weider a standing ovation.

What feminism means to me

Sandie Benitah
20Something

Feminism. Apparently, I and the rest of the MTV generation have no appreciation of the concept.

Recently, as my co-workers and I gathered around the board table for our weekly news meeting, an argument broke out between the 20something female staff versus the 50something men over the merits of strip aerobics, a new exercise technique popping up in gyms across the city.

Ironically, if one of the men was writing this column, the word "exercise" would surely be put in quotations. But, being a liberated woman, I am proud to participate and promote any fun technique that will get my butt off the couch and into a gym.

To the men in the room, my young female colleagues and I were prime examples of everything that's wrong with women today.

To the girls in the room, the men's attitude is the reason why women have been banging their heads against the wall in frustration for decades.

I always thought feminism was about freedom of choice and access to equal opportunities. Sometimes, however, it seems as if feminism has become just another role for women to play.

"The problem is, you guys weren't around for the bra-burning days so you can't understand how men have been trained to respect women," said one of the guys at the meeting.

I don't have to burn my bra to know that men shouldn't respect women because they're female. They should respect us because of our personalities, our likes, dislikes, our quirks, our silly girlishness one second and our tomboyish mannerisms the next. They should respect us because we're humans, not just women.

Even some women, I feel, have taken the concept of feminism and have turned it into a limiting stereotype.

As women, do we have the right to look down on girls such as Britney Spears or Christina Aguilera because of their outward sexuality? Isn't feminism about the freedom to be comfortable and confident? How many times have I heard women say that these "type of girls" have set feminism back 50 years. I think those comments are the ones that hold us back.

Am I not a feminist because I think women should stay at home and raise their children? Am I setting a bad example if I don't hand over my keys and my kids to a nanny?

If that's the case, then I'm guilty as charged and proud of it.

If some hot guy calls me "babe," I'm not appalled. If some girl walks down the street with her toned tummy showing, I say good for her.

This babe knows no matter how girly I get, I'm just as smart as the next guy. I can handle a screwdriver as well as I can handle a mop. I'm just as comfortable wearing a sexy dress as I am wearing my favourite loose sweatpants.

That's what feminism is about. Nothing more, and certainly nothing less.

CHEESE LATKES W/APPLE PEAR SAUCE

2 potatoes
2/3 cup dry cottage cheese
2 eggs
2-1/2 tblsp. matzoh meal
1/4 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
2 garlic cloves, minced
peanut oil

Peel, cube, and boil potatoes. Mash. Add cottage cheese. Set aside. Beat eggs well; add matzoh meal, baking powder, and seasonings. Add to cottage cheese mixture. Heat oil until hot; pour large spoonfuls of batter into oil. Cook until brown; flip to cook other side. Serve with apple pear sauce.

Sauce: 8 medium apples
5 medium pears
3 tsp. lemon rind
1 tsp. cinnamon (or to taste)

Core and cut apples and pears. Cover well with water and cook until soft. Stir occasionally to prevent sticking. Process in food processor. Add in lemon rind and cinnamon.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My fiancé and I have had many discussions about whether or not to have children. They always end badly. We are both in agreement that we are uncomfortable bringing a child into a world that is slowly being destroyed. There is so much hate, war, pollution and devastation. We know logically that we don't want to add to the world's problems and that we don't want to burden our child with what we have done to this planet. Even though I understand the logic behind this decision, I can't let go of my childhood dreams of always wanting to be a "mommy".

I realize this is not something anyone can decide for us, and I'm sure we are not the only couple that has contemplated this problem. I just wanted to hear another opinion.

Major Life Decision

Dear Major Life Decision

One of the strongest instincts of any species is to procreate, and in Judaism, we are commanded to "be fruitful and multiply." The main difference between humans and other living creatures is that we have the ability to reason and think on a higher level, and it's obvious that you are exercising that ability.

There's no question that we have messed up this world. Whether it's about politics, the environment or over-population, the news is not good.

It's true that we have tampered with nature, and in turn with our own evolutionary path, by bringing children into this world and teaching them to be just like us.

It's impressive that you have put so much thought into having a child. What it really shows is that if you do choose to have a child, you will not do so lightly. Maybe the child you bring into the world will be taught not only to respect the world we live in, but also to learn how to turn things around. Your child will be raised to be ecologically and politically aware.

It's not unlike a child with a toy: the world is our toy. The only difference is that if we break it permanently, we don't get another chance. Here is your opportunity to teach a child how to play respectfully with our most precious toy, and maybe make the difference that we all need to survive.

Conversations with God

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Miriam and I recently went to see Conversations with God, a movie based on a book of the same title. The book was written by Neil Donald Walsch, who, following a serious car accident, lost his job and became homeless.

URBAN WRITER

Conversations with God is mostly about Walsch's struggle to discover the strength within him required to get off the street. The movie is worthwhile, if only in that it helps us understand how a person can sink so low and the troubles they go through to survive and sometimes find their way back into society.

At some point in the depths of despair, Walsch begins a process of mindfulness, or what he refers to as an inner discussion with God. He begins writing down his ideas and ultimately produces a book whose rights are later bought by Putnam Publishing for $1.5 million.

One of the central themes of Walsch's book is the idea that we must live life to its fullest, as opposed to just making ends meet. I was inspired by Walsch's words and considered how it plays out in my own world.

In my position as director of a humanitarian organization, I often meet people who seem to be happy with their lives because of sensible and often risky decisions they have made. On the other hand, I also frequently come into contact with individuals who are saddened by their lives, trapped, because of erroneous choices and their belief that they are unable to rise above their lot.

Like Walsch, I believe we have the ability to be content. I do, because I have seen people break away from their old habits of drudgery and depression, discovering instead satisfaction and enthusiasm.

In my experience, those who have been able to do this have a strong inner voice, or as Walsch says: "Within every one of us there is a voice that speaks the truth." These people gather strength and direction as they go, always researching, reading, listening and trying to understand how others have achieved self-satisfaction.

Happier people seem to open their eyes wide and accept advice, suggestions and adhere to the line in Pirkei Avot: 'Who is a wise person? One who learns from all people."

A good example of a man who seemed happy with his lot, was the late Milt Harris. I wrote an article about him after his passing; in it I mentioned that Milt learned the harpsichord in his senior years, took a huge interest in the gorrillas of Uganda and was at the top of his game in business upon his demise. Milt (may he rest in peace) is just one of the people who inspired me to push harder and dig deeper for the things that ultimately made me more content.

Life flitters by. We are faced with great struggles and some very sad days. But then there is the potential, the ability to attain fulfilment.

Our community has so many role models for us. There are endless books out there, including Conversations with God, to help us move forward and find the happiness we have always craved. Many would say that the biblical characters are a fine example of self-growth, such as Abraham who left Ur of Chaldees to discover his mission and ultimately God and Judaism.

Don't let life pass you by. Remember your dreams and run after them like an Olympian. Remember the people you saw change their lives and emulate them. Life is short. While you are here, make it compelling.

Perhaps, too, it would be wise if we all had conversations with God. No doubt, He would have some worthwhile insight into our lives and some divine advice and recommendations.

This most recent gift will certainly reinforce Mount Sinai's already strong international reputation in these important areas."

— Rt. Hon. STEPHEN HARPER, Prime Minister of Canada

TORONTO – Visionary philanthropists Joseph and Wolf Lebovic have set a new standard in philanthropy with a landmark donation of $50 million – the largest contribution to healthcare in Canadian history – to Mount Sinai Hospital. Their historic gift will help Mount Sinai to build on its pre-eminence in patient care, teaching and research, further developing areas of excellence that best serve our patients.

The Lebovic brothers, successful business leaders whose company, Lebovic Enterprises, develops residential properties across the Greater Toronto Area, came to Canada as Holocaust survivors in 1949. Today, the brothers generously give back to the community that welcomed them more than 50 years ago with major contributions that reflect a profound desire to advance Canadian society and improve the lives of all its citizens.

During the span of five decades, Mount Sinai has benefited from the extraordinary generosity and vision of Joseph and Wolf Lebovic. Through leadership and inspirational donations that are deeply rooted in their personal history and cultural tradition, the brothers have created an outstanding legacy that allows the Hospital to prepare for tomorrow while providing the best possible care for patients today.

Their transformational gift of $50 million will help Mount Sinai Hospital to address its highest priorities – quality of care, patient experience, and academic mission. It will help to fund the Hospital's share of a major capital redevelopment program currently being planned in partnership with the Province, with the initial support of an $8 million planning and design grant. The first phase of this plan is the renewal and expansion of the world-class Women's and Infants' Health Centre of Excellence.

The gift supports the Province's healthcare objectives, including the reduction of wait times, and confirms Mount Sinai Hospital's international stature.

"The Lebovic family gift is another example of what we can achieve in Ontario when we dream, work and build together. Not only will this contribution help health care professionals at Mount Sinai deliver the best possible care today, it will ensure new breakthroughs in health care for years to come."

— The Honourable DALTON MCGUINTY, Premier of Ontario

Conservative movement allows gay/lesbian commitment ceremonies

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Conservative movement's committee on Jewish law and standards has endorsed three conflicting opinions on homosexuality, one of which allows commitment ceremonies for gay and lesbian couples, as well as the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis.

Five tshuvot, or responsa, were presented last week in New York during a two-day meeting of the movement's highest legal body, but only three papers garnered enough votes in the 25-member voting committee to pass.

Two opinions upheld earlier prohibitions on homosexual activity, but the third endorsed commitment ceremonies and the ordination of gay rabbis, while retaining the biblical ban on male sodomy.

Two other opinions that were under consideration, which would have removed all restrictions on gay activity, were declared takanot, or substantial breaks from tradition that would require a majority of the committee members for adoption. They were defeated.

Canadian rabbis don't expect changes to take hold in Canada

An opinion by Rabbi Joel Roth affirmed the movement's traditional ban on gay rabbis and commitment ceremonies. Another, by rabbis Elliot Dorff, Daniel Nevins and Avram Reisner, reversed those positions while upholding the biblical prohibition on male intercourse. Both papers earned 13 votes, a majority of the law committee.

The decision on the latter paper "left open what that means in terms of commitment ceremonies, but it said that in general, because the Jewish tradition favours monogomy and because marriage stabilizes communities, etc., some ceremony down the road should be developed, and it also said, therefore, that it should be permissible for gays and lesbians to apply to rabbinical school and to serve as rabbis or as cantors," said Beth Tzedec Congregation's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, who is a voting member of the law committee.

A third opinion, by Rabbi Leonard Levy, which earned the minimum six votes required for acceptance, also affirmed the movement's traditional position on homosexuality while rejecting the now-common view that

NEW ORLEANS — Ottawa restaurateur Moishe Smith was named president of B'nai Brith International last week at the organization's board of governors meeting in New Orleans. He's the first non-American to hold the post in B'nai Brith's 163-year history. His term runs until 2009. More than 200 B'nai Brith members gathered in New Orleans last week for a policy conference.

WORLD

All-Chanukah Radio

WASHINGTON — A U.S. satellite radio broadcaster is offering an all-Chanukah station. XM Satellite Radio will run Radio Chanukah for the length of the holiday, Dec. 15 to 23, as part of its seasonal offerings. It will feature holiday music and traditions, and Jewish celebrities such as Matisyahu and Stephen Page of Toronto's Barenaked Ladies.

Iran Holds Conference

TEHRAN — Iran said that it was planning to host an international Holocaust revisionism conference this week. A Foreign Ministry official said 67 "scholars" from 30 countries would convene in Tehran to discuss the fate of the Jews in World War II, including whether the Nazis used gas chambers for mass killings. The conference was dubbed "Holocaust, World Prospect." Iran's president has drawn censure for calling the Shoah a myth, though the controversy didn't stop his government from hosting a Shoah-themed cartoon contest earlier this year.

School Ranked No. 1

LONDON — A Jewish day school ranked No. 1 in a British government survey. The report, released Dec. 7, ranked the North Cheshire Jewish School as the best primary school in Britain. Of the 209 primary schools in Britain whose pupils all reached the expected standard for 11-year-olds in English, math and science, almost two-thirds are faith-based schools, including Jewish, Catholic and Church of England institutions. Some 16,000 primary schools were included in the survey.

Muslims Attack Teens

ANTWERP — Some 60 chassidic teens from Antwerp were attacked by young Muslims in northeast Belgium. The youths went to Beringen Nov. 30, and as they arrived at their hostel in a largely Muslim area, 10 youths approached, throwing stones at the building and shouting anti-Semitic epithets. The Jewish group's leaders called police. Undeterred by the police's arrival, the youths kept throwing stones. The Jewish group left that night, accompanied to the highway by police. The attackers were sentenced to community service.

Carter Book Protested

ATLANTA — A Middle East expert resigned from Emory University's Carter Center over former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's new book, Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid. In a statement last week, Ken Stein distanced himself from Carter and the centre's recent activities, emphasizing that he "had nothing to do with the research, preparation, writing, or review" of the new book. "Any material which he used from the book we did together in 1984, The Blood of Abraham, he used unilaterally." The new book "is replete with factual errors, copied materials not cited, superficialities, glaring omissions, and simply invented segments. Aside from the one-sided nature of the book, meant to provoke, there are recollections cited from meetings where I was the third person in the room, and my notes of those meetings show little similarity to points claimed in the book," Stein wrote. Stein, who was associated with the centre for 23 years, will remain in Emory's history and political science departments and as director of its Institute for the Study of Modern Israel.

Jackie Settles Suit

NEW YORK — Jews for Jesus said sorry to Jewish comedian Jackie Mason last week in order to settle a lawsuit. The group distributed a pamphlet featuring a caricature of Mason and the words: "Jackie Mason… A Jew for Jesus!?" Mason, who is not part of the group, sued for $2 million (US). Last week, he accepted an apology instead, along with a promise not to distribute the pamphlet. He said the apology acknowledged that "You can't be a table and a chair. You're either a Jew or a gentile."

Aliyah Logo Contest

NEW YORK — BabagaNewz, the Jewish magazine for middle school students, and the aliyah organization Nefesh B'Nefesh are seeking North American students in grades 4 to 7 to create a logo for one of the latter's summer aliyah planes. The creator of the winning logo will win a three-day, four-night trip to Israel. The first 100 entrants will also get a book about Jerusalem. Rules and entry form are at www.babaganewz.com. The contest closes Jan. 29.

Prager Rapped For Attack On Congressman

LOS ANGELES — Jewish groups criticized radio host and author Dennis Prager for attacking a U.S. congressman who plans to use a Qur'an in a private swearing-in ceremony.

In his column on Townhall.com last week Prager, a conservative talk-show host and author of a number of books on Judaism, rapped the plan by U.S. Representative-elect Keith Ellison, a Minnesota Democrat, saying it would do "more damage to the unity of America and to the value system that has formed this country than the terrorists of 9-11."

Prager said that all members of Congress, including Jews, use a Christian Bible for swearing in. In fact, members of the U.S. House of Representatives are sworn in en masse with no holy books. Some later hold private, unofficial photo-op ceremonies holding a family Bible, which is what Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress, was referring to.

Prager's column was "intolerant, misinformed and downright un-American," the Anti-Defamation League said, adding that his recent appointment to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council holds him to a higher standard. The Reform movement's Religious Action Center said Prager's was a "shameful argument" that would harm Jews if gained currency.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) called for Prager to be removed from the Holocaust council, which oversees the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

A Chanukah Reminder from

Steeles Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

E-mail flyer distributed during Liberal convention

Rae campaign targeted by anti-Semitic slurs

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Racial politics marred the Liberal leadership convention earlier this month as candidate Bob Rae was the target of anti-Semitic smears that drew attention to his links to the Jewish community.

A source close to Rae's wife, Arlene Perly Rae, confirmed a Canadian Press report last week that said Perly Rae was approached at the convention by a delegate who didn't know who she was and told not to vote for Rae "because his wife is Jewish."

The delegate hastily retreated when Perly Rae informed the person that she was the candidate's wife.

The incident wasn't the only example of what are being described as anti-Semitic smears against Rae.

In another, an unsigned e-mail flyer was distributed during the convention that aimed to sway support away from Rae by labelling him a supporter of "Israeli Apartheid" and of "Israel's illegal Apartheid wall."

The flyer warned delegates not to "elect a leader who supports Apartheid".

The flyer also made reference to Perly Rae and her role as a vice-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which the flyer said "supports Israeli Apartheid".

In a Dec. 6 column in the Globe and Mail, Tarek Fatah, founder of the Muslim Canadian Congress and a Rae delegate at the convention, wrote that Khaled Mouammar, president of the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF), had forwarded the flyer as a mass e-mail, and Fatah lamented the ugly politics at the convention.

"Stéphane Dion's... victory came in part through a political process that feeds on racial and religious exploitation," Fatah wrote.

However, in Dec. 7 press release, the CAF categorically denied having anything to do with the flyer, insisting instead that it originated from Ron Saba, the editor of Montreal Planet Magazine.

Attempts by The CJN to contact Saba were unsuccessful.

"We never put out or circulated anything," said Mohamed Boudjenane, the CAF's executive director. "It was an e-mail sent out by Ron Saba and forwarded to some people here in Toronto, never to delegates or parliamentarians. CAF is a non-partisan organization. We don't get involved in partisan politics and we never will."

But CP reported that it had obtained an e-mail sent by Mouammar in which he forwarded the flyers to others, and it reported that a few days before the convention, the flyer ended up on the website of an immigrant advocacy group. Mouammar reportedly wrote on the site that the flyer had "nothing to do" with the Raes' religion "but has a lot to do with their political views."

In its press release, the CAF endorsed the flyer's content, which also denounced Rae for giving a speech to the Jewish National Fund, an organization that the CAF said is "complicit in war crimes and ethnic cleansing."

The CAF said JNF manages state lands in Israel and only allows Jews to live on them, "a practice that amounts to ethnic cleansing."

Let's 'do more Jewish'

From the editor's desk

Very often, when Jews gather in large or small groups these days and the conversation steers toward Israel, someone will express a sense of bewilderment that nearly borders on high anxiety, in reference to the fact that Israel's enemies are again openly proclaiming their desire to "wipe it off the map."

The combination of the heightened feeling of vulnerability stemming from Israel's inconclusive though devastating war last summer with Hezbollah (Iran and Syria too) and the menacing possibility of a nuclear Iran, leaves many Jews worried.

Thus, during these conversations, it is not unusual to hear statements such as: "I can't ever recall feeling this way about Israel's future." Or: "I would never have imagined, that in my lifetime, I would have to worry about this."

It is folly to try to suppress the worries and fears as if they were nothing more than a nagging cough. They are legitimate and they are proof of abiding commitment to and connection with the Jewish people. They must be acknowledged and, as far as possible, channelled into constructive individual engagement. The question, of course, is – how?

Nearly two years ago, when there was a steep spike in the number of incidents of anti-Semitism and vandalism of Jewish property in Ontario, Prof. Martin Lockshin urged a large gathering at York University to "do more Jewish things" as a way of defeating the craven anti-Semites who hide their identities behind masks, in darkness at night. It was also a perfect way, he suggested, of personally affirming the very thing that the vandals, thugs, bullies and ignoramuses were trying to deny us: our place in the world as Jews.

Lockshin's formula of "doing more Jewish things" rings out with even greater urgency and relevance today. But it is important to note that he neither prescribed nor proscribed what it meant to do "more Jewish things."

Whether the activities are religious, scholarly, educational, cultural or social, trans-, inter-, or intra-affiliation, the key for the individual was to take action, to act assertively, with self-awareness and, if possible, with deep satisfaction, in affirming what our enemies hate: our commitment to Jewish legitimacy and history, to our Jewish past and to our Jewish future.

To more clearly appreciate the transformative individual significance of "doing Jewish," it helps to understand the underlying, truer meaning of Israel's enemies' threats and postures against the Jewish state. Jews have no place in the Middle East as a sovereign nation, they say. This is not a political assertion, it is a theological one.

When Yasser Arafat scoffed to Bill Clinton and Ehud Barak that there was no evidence of a Jewish Temple in Jerusalem, he was not misrepresenting Jewish history, he was deriding Jewish faith.

When Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad denigrates and dismisses the murder 60 years ago of six million Jews, he is not attempting to rewrite modern history, he is attempting to rewrite the mysterious, millennial relationship between God and the Jewish people.

In an inspiring essay written in 1973 by the late scholar Eliezer Berkovits titled On Jewish Sovereignty (released as part of a collection of his writing called Essential Essays on Judaism, edited by David Hazony, Shalem Press, Jerusalem 2002), Rabbi Berkovits explains the heart of the meaning of the concept of covenant in Judaism. The implications for Jewish individualism are profound and liberating.

"In terms of the covenant, one might say that whereas in other religions, the 'covenant' is between the individual and his God, in Judaism the covenant with the individual derives from the larger covenant with the people.

"This, however, leads us to the essential distinction between religion as traditionally understood, and Judaism. The concern of religion is with the right belief, the credo. Judaism's main concern is with the deed… In Judaism, the significance of faith lies in its capacity to lead to life, to action, to the human deed… The goal is the deed, guided by the teaching."

For Rabbi Berkovits, covenant meant the creation of a people whose focus was on the deed – the mitzvah, the mission – acting as Torah teaches, in this world, in a manner that "always affects others, impinges on their lives, and always refers beyond the boundaries of isolated individuality" and is always for an overall higher purpose.

But, as he also beautifully and powerfully noted, the people is bound up with the land. "If the people of Israel is the instrument of realization [of improving the world through deeds], there must be a land of Israel as the place of realization."

Rabbi Berkovits succinctly explains the metaphysical, theological and practical effect of denying the right of Jewish sovereignty to the land of Israel.

"Apart from falsifying the essence of Judaism," he wrote, "the severance of the land [of Israel] from the faith brings in its wake a re-evaluation of Jewish history." And what is it that would be re-evaluated? The "conviction that the Jews' role in history would ultimately be revealed through their return to Zion," a belief for which Jews struggled, prayed, lived and died throughout the ages.

Israel's enemies are fully aware of this theology too. It bothers them and they strive mightily to annul its cogency. And this brings us squarely back to Lockshin. To "do Jewish" is to confound Israel's enemies because it affirms the thing that bothers them our Judaism, our covenant with people, land, history and God. Chanukah is a good time to start. –MBD

One Family Fund opens in Jerusalem

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

One Family Fund, an organization that helps victims of terror in Israel, has opened its own centre in Jerusalem.

In addition to providing a meeting place, the centre offers therapy and support groups, and activities for adults and youth.

Pam Albert, Canadian director of the One Family Fund, who was in Israel recently to show support for residents of northern Israel, said the organization recently received a $50,000 grant from KRG Children's Charity Foundation, a Canadian-based charity, to run youth programs at the centre.

Another grant from a Canadian donor, she said, has allowed One Family Fund to furnish a youth club on the centre's third floor.

"We now have a drop-in centre, fitness room and arts and crafts room, and we have a place for kids to stay over when we run retreats. There is also room for caseworkers to do their work."

A big component of the youth centre, she said, is to have a place where kids can come and "hang around with other kids and help each other out.

"It's incredible how people who suffer such loss want to try and help others. They get strength from giving back. It makes them feel like they have a purpose. This space is a haven for them."

Albert said her daughter Emily, 10, who toured the centre with her, suggested to her Grade 5 class at Forest Hill Public School that they design a collage for the youth centre. "We did it in the form of a puzzle, and each puzzle piece had a picture of peace on it. It's now hanging on the wall."

Albert has a vision of setting up a memorial room within the centre.

"This would be a quiet place within the building where families can keep the memory of their loved ones alive," she said. "We plan on having a videographer document the life of the victim, and we want a space where families can gather and find some closure."

The memorial room "is still a work in progress, but it would be a very important component of the centre."

The Jewish Agency for Israel has identified the Israel Program Center in Toronto as its top office in North America for sending young adults to Israel in 2006, said Michal Kaye, the centre's regional director.

Kaye, who deals with young adults from Toronto to the Canadian west coast, she said that per capita, more young Canadian Jews than young American Jews are taking part in Jewish Agency-sponsored programming.

She said the Jewish Agency's New York office, which placed second and also deals with Jews in New Jersey, has sent 99 people to Israel so far this year, while the Toronto office has sent 118.

Some two million Jews live in New York and New Jersey combined, compared to less than 400,000 Jews that live in all of Canada, and still the Toronto office sent more Jews to Israel in 2006 than the New York office, Kaye noted.

"Even if I include Vancouver in my numbers, we're looking at maybe 300,000 Jews across the board, and we're still sending per capita… more young adults than any other city in North America," Kaye said.

She estimates that she sent about 115 Jews between the ages of 18 to 35 to participate in volunteer programs in Israel during all of last year.

If you include people who have gone on the IPC's newest program – the Partnership 2000 Toronto Eilat Volunteer Program, known as Eilat-Eilot, which is unique to Toronto – the numbers for this year have jumped to about 190, Kaye said.

The volunteer program in Eilat offers young Jews the opportunity to work in several different fields for a minimum of six weeks, including at a school helping teens with their matriculation English exams; at a summer camp as a counsellor; at a hospital or on a kibbutz.

"The options are endless, and we are funded by [the Jewish Agency's] Partnership 2000 [program], which allows us to provide all the volunteers with a stipend of about 1,200 shekels a month, and that covers their transportation in Eilat to and from work, and meals. They get accommodation as well," Kaye said, adding that the programs are very affordable, costing less than $1,000 (US), not including the flight to Israel.

Other options include professional internships for two to six months, for which participants are offered a $75-a-month stipend.

"We've had people at the Jerusalem Post [and] at the Jewish Agency. We've had people in graphic design companies and in businesses just across the board," Kaye said.

Kaye realizes that parents and their children have safety concerns when it comes to living in Israel, but she hopes this won't deter them from taking part in the programs.

"I think that we're all watching the news to see what's happening. I hope that, just as Canadians have done in the past, that they won't stop going. I'm hoping that [the numbers will] be the same next year."

She said that if people are worried about the safety issue, they can take part in programs away from the [conflict].

"Parents and kids should know that safety is our Number 1 priority with all our programs."

She guessed that the increase of young adults who are opting to volunteer in Israel can be attributed to Jews who are starting to see travel to Israel as more of a priority, as well as to positive experiences on birthright israel trips and word of mouth from friends who took part in programs.

Jordana Warner, a participant in the Israel Program Centre.

Jordana Warner, 21, a fourth-year sociology student at the University of Western Ontario, said she heard about the Eilat program from her cousin, who had volunteered in Eilat the year before.

"I worked at a day camp with really young kids," Warner said.

"I liked the staff, I loved working there, it was a great atmosphere, and I had a great time," she said, adding that taking a leadership role was difficult because she doesn't speak fluent Hebrew.

"It was definitely a drawback in communicating with the kids and staff. But I still managed. The people I worked with were really inclusive nonetheless," she said.

"Not being able to speak Hebrew is not a reason why you shouldn't be going," Kaye said, adding that most people in Israel speak English, and for those who work with children who don't speak English well, there is always someone on hand to translate.

Kaye said that perhaps the most popular program IPC offers is with Magen David Adom.

"It's usually a six-week program and you volunteer in an ambulance and you get to give back to society," she said.

Kaye said young Jews need to "get off the tour bus, and experience Israel," adding that volunteer programs are great for Diaspora-Israel relations.

"They get to experience what it's like to be an Israeli and go to work and be a part of that society. So instead of just hearing about it, they really get to see it."

America weary; Israel wary

Americans, it appears, have wearied of the effort to help Iraqis establish a democratic way of life. The images of the atrocities perpetrated in Iraq by Muslims against Muslims are too horrific. The frequency of their intrusion into American living rooms is too overwhelming. And the mounting toll of dead American men and women serving in Iraq is too maddening. In all, the carefully cultivated, unabating slaughter in post-Saddam Iraq has pushed the majority of the American public to their Iraq limit.

The report released last week by the bipartisan, James Baker and Lee Hamilton-led Iraq Study Group (ISG) is intended to provide the foreign policy springboard for the next leap of American politics towards disengagement from Iraq.

Setting aside entirely the pressing discussion on the merits and/or methods of American withdrawal from Iraq, the ISG report contains various references and allusions that strongly suggest that in an attempt to burnish anew its tarnished face in the Arab world, the United States may soon embark on a campaign of pressuring Israel.

"The U.S. cannot achieve its goals in the Middle East," Baker and Hamilton wrote, "unless it embarks on a renewed and sustained commitment to a comprehensive peace plan on all fronts." (Our emphasis) That statement is clearly a reference to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. But two large questions beg to be asked: (1) After the failure of Oslo, after the failure of Camp David in September 2000, after the withdrawal in 2005 from Gaza, after the election of the avowedly anti-State of Israel Hamas leadership and after the unceasing barrage, ever since the Israeli withdrawal, of Qassam rockets into Israel from Gaza, what more can Israel do to achieve "comprehensive peace"? (2) What, in any event, is the causal connection between the sadistic, ongoing killing in Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict?

The ISG report demonstrates no link between the two conflicts except a strained associative one that, essentially, can be reduced to the following kernel: the radicalized Arab world hates the United States and Israel, which it sees as a client, if not a protectorate, of America. Thus, to abate the radicalized Arab world's hatred of America, the U.S. is prepared to twist the arm of the Jewish state. In one of the most pungent examples of its absurd, failed thinking, the report contains a statement that suggests either the most naive wishful thinking or most egregious, wilful blindness by its authors: "The United States should embark on a robust diplomatic effort… [which] should include every country that has an interest in averting a chaotic Iraq, including all of Iraq's neighbours, Iran and Syria among them. Despite the well-known differences between many of these countries, they all share an interest in avoiding the horrific consequences that would flow from a chaotic Iraq, particularly a humanitarian catastrophe and regional destabilization."

To state that Iran and Syria wish to avoid the horrific consequences in Iraq that they, more than anyone, have authored is to also compel Israeli decision-makers to be very wary of the long-term impact of the ISG report.

Immigrants grateful for JIAS help

This letter is to acknowledge our gratitude to the Jewish community for all the care that we received.

Being recent immigrants to Canada, not speaking very much English, and not knowing much about the laws of the country, we encountered countless problems and obstacles while dealing with certain individuals who were trying to scam and defraud us. We went through real hell, and felt quite helpless, that was until the Jewish community got involved.

Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) Toronto, in particular, managed to facilitate, smooth out and virtually eliminate most of our problems. Through JIAS we received not only basic support, but were also treated with care, attention, and even love. It felt like treatment you would receive from your family. What they were able to do was simply remarkable.

Great appreciation and many thanks to JIAS, and especially Dina Polyak. Dina has been our guardian angel, helping and guiding us through all the trouble. The time she spent sorting out our business cannot be measured by hours, since it seems that she was always there for us at any hour, day or night. She is an amazing, caring, and wonderful individual – the epitome of a social worker.

Once again, please accept our gratitude. God bless all of you!

Surrendering land fuels extremism

For how long will the Israeli government continue to dig its country into a grave ("Olmert offers comprehensive peace," CJN, Nov. 30)? Yet again, a liberal-leaning prime minster has promised to hand over more Israeli territory to the Palestinians, despite the glaring evidence from the past that such attempts at peace are utterly futile. Time after time, Israel proffers its land in the name of peace, and time after time, the peace is shattered by Palestinians who continue their attacks on Israeli civilians. The truth is that Israeli and Palestinian states cannot coexist harmoniously while the desire to eradicate the Jewish state from the map continues to exist among Palestinians. And seeing as such sentiments have been imbedded within Palestinian children since their birth, they show no sign of dissipating any time in the future. How much of the Holy Land will the Israeli government surrender before it realizes that this only fuels the ambitions of embittered and bloodthirsty Palestinian extremists?

Two strikes against the Ontario gov't

The Jewish community's and other minority denominations' schools in Ontario are excluded from the benefit of public school funding inclusion while a majority denomination is funded. This has been strike one for far too long a time

Strike two is the imminent provincial election campaign, for which the government has yet to alter the election date that coincides with a Jewish holiday ("Ont. election date conflicts with Shemini Atzeret," CJN, Nov. 30). Results often come down to a slight a margin as small as one per cent of the vote. Candidates and their volunteers who for reasons of conscience won't participate in "getting out the vote" on election day are quite realistically disadvantaged. It is absolutely clear that there are political parties who will gain from shutting out those who observe Jewish holidays.

Winnipeg bone marrow clinic

In "Bone marrow clinic draws more than 100 potential donors," (CJN, Nov. 30, there was some incorrect information. Please note that both the Toronto and Winnipeg drives were held under the auspices of the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation.

The article stated that "Toronto's drive focused on finding a match for one Toronto-area person who needs a transplant." While this is true, all donors who came out to the Toronto drive will be entered in the Gift of Life's registry of volunteer donors, as were the donors of the drive that took place in Winnipeg, thereby increasing the likelihood of finding a match for Zvi Golish and other Jewish people living with leukemia and in need of a life-saving bone marrow transplant.

Conservative Judaism's ruling on gay, lesbian Jews

Decision was difficult, but showed diversity

By RABBI JEROME M. EPSTEIN

Conservative Judaism has taken a historic step by opening a door to the ordination of gay men and lesbians and to same-sex commitment ceremonies. In line with Conservative Judaism's most cherished values, this decision reflects both a reasoned approach toward Halachah and respect for ever-evolving Conservative beliefs and practices.

Jerome M. Epstein

It is important to understand that the responsa, or decisions, of the Rabbinical Assembly's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards – of which I am a voting member – force nothing on Conservative Jews. Instead they provide options to them based on the Conservative understanding of Jewish law.

Conservative Judaism has always looked upon change as an organic process. As Conservative Jews, we are equal partners in the process of creating an authentic and resonant Judaism that gives full recognition to the claims of the past while considering the realities of the present.

Those Conservative communities and institutions prepared to move forward in accordance with the law committee's decision now are free to engage openly gay and lesbian rabbis and cantors, and to host same-sex commitment ceremonies. Those that opt for the status quo are equally free to do so. The communities, under the direction of their rabbis, are the final authorities. Change is a process generated from within.

There is no judgment in the committee's decisions about which is the correct course of action. Both positions now are considered valid.

This, too, is in keeping with the Conservative way: diversity has long been a basic truth of our movement.

We draw strength from these differences as they help us to recognize the dignity in all Jews, in all people and in competing views.

A basic tenet of the Conservative movement is that each congregational rabbi is the mara d'atra, the final arbiter of Jewish law, within his or her congregation. As executive vice-president of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, I act as the organization's mara d'atra.

In that capacity, I have decided that United Synagogue hiring policy may be changed. I will recommend to the United Synagogue leadership that we modify our practice and consider applicants for United Synagogue jobs regardless of their sexual orientation. No longer does Conservative Halachah stand in the way of fully engaging gay men and lesbians in United Synagogue's work environment or elsewhere in Conservative institutional and synagogue life.

The point about Halachah is an important one. Conservative Judaism remains a Halachah-based movement. Scholarship in the nuances of Halachah is a hallmark of Conservative Judaism, and serious scholarship was applied in the course of the deliberations that led to the law committee's decision.

Whenever Halachah can be interpreted to include gay men and lesbians, we have done so. When it cannot be so interpreted, we say so honestly.

Even the wisest of human decisions involves trade-offs. Tension among passionately held viewpoints in sincere and respectful opposition is unavoidable.

This can be painful. I fully recognize that some Conservative Jews will find the committee's decision difficult to reconcile with their personal views. I urge them to accept the pluralism that has been a hallmark of our movement and focus on the values, ideology and practices that unite us.

It is up to each congregation – and each Conservative Jew – to grapple with this decision as best he or she can. The United Synagogue will be there, as always, to provide guidance and resources. The United Synagogue is committed to standing by the side of each congregation as it works through this process in its own way and its own time.

Conservative Judaism's great strength is its commitment to sustained and deep engagement with the great issues of the day as a community of believers in the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah. At this emotional turning point, it is incumbent upon us to remember that what binds us together is of far greater importance than what separates us.

We cannot shrink from the complexity that Conservative Judaism's weaving together of tradition and modernity fosters.

It is perhaps no accident that the same week the law committee held its debate, the Torah portion speaks of Jacob wrestling with God. As a result of this encounter, Jacob evolves into a stronger and wiser person and is renamed Israel.

As we struggle forward it is my heartfelt prayer that as a result of our wrestling with the issue we confront, we, too, will become stronger as individuals and in our commitment to Jewish living and to our fellow Jews.

Rabbi Jerome Epstein is executive vice-president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the association of Conservative congregations in North America.

Some reactions

An abandonment of all pretense of fealty to Judaism

This ruling doesn't conserve the Jewish tradition, it defies it.

The entire corpus of Halachah, or Jewish religious law, makes abundantly clear that homosexual behaviour is sinful. That a movement claiming to uphold the Jewish religious tradition can arrogate to stand halachic Judaism on its head is tragic. It will no doubt cheer those who place contemporary mores above the Jewish mandate, but in the end, it seals the fate of a movement long mired in muddle and malaise.

While every Jew is precious in the eyes of Heaven, and while some of us may face more difficult challenges than others as we strive to live by the Torah's prescriptions, that striving is the very essence of what it means to be a Jew committed to Judaism.

- Rabbi Avi Shafran, director of public affairs for Agudath Israel

Commitment to Jewish law utterly stripped away

In keeping with a decades-old pattern on a host of issues, the Conservative view which breaks ranks with Jewish law and tradition is the one which ultimately sweeps the movement. Given this reality, the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards would have been more forthright had it acknowledged a blanket reversal of the biblical prohibition on homosexuality. Its endorsement of same-sex commitment ceremonies and the ordination of homosexuals while ostensibly maintaining the traditional ban on anal sex is not only disingenuous. It is ludicrous.

Our hearts go out to the dwindling corps of traditionalists who until now have remained within the Conservative movement. Any fig leaf of commitment to Jewish law within their institutions has now been utterly stripped away.

The issue of homosexual behaviour in Jewish life is complex, not because there is any doubt whether it is clearly prohibited by the Torah, but because Judaism also teaches compassion for human beings struggling with their contending impulses. The Union for Traditional Judaism has addressed that complexity with an approach which is honest, caring and faithful to Jewish law. In contrast, the Conservative movement has once again finessed the tradition to give its abandonment of Jewish law a patina of Jewish authenticity. Let no one be fooled.

-Rabbis Bruce Ginsburg and Ronald Price, respectively the president and executive vice-president of the Union for Traditional Judaism

Commends advancement of rights of gay and lesbian Jews

We applaud the CJLS for taking a step toward advancing the rights of gay and lesbian Jews. We hope that this will lead to a clearer position of welcoming openly gay and lesbian candidates for the Conservative rabbinate, and to the religious celebration of same-sex unions within the Conservative movement.

Our own experience in the Reconstructionist movement suggests that our community can only be enriched by the full inclusion of gay and lesbian Jews.

Reconstructionist Jews have been in the forefront of these issues for more than two decades. In 1984, the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College became the first rabbinical seminary to accept openly gay and lesbian students and was the first to endorse the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis. In 2004, the Reconstructionist movement took another important step by endorsing civil marriage for same-sex couples.

We continue to hope that by our speaking out on such issues (related to same-sex matters), we can encourage all religions of the world to put behind them discriminatory behaviour and hateful words, and instead follow the road of peace and compassion.

-Rabbi Dan Ehrenkrantz, president of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College; Rabbi Richard Hirsh, executive director of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association; and Carl Sheingold, executive vice president of the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation.

To the JTS Community

*Excerpts from the response by Arnold Eisen, chancellor-elect of the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS), to the decision by the Conservative movement's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards (*CJLS).

As we embark on the next stage of our consideration of gay and lesbian ordination at JTS, I am confident that the longstanding JTS tradition of embracing and respecting significant differences of opinion will continue to guide us. I write to remind you of the steps through which we at JTS will carry the discussion forward in coming weeks.

Arnold Eisen

First, let me emphasize that the halachic authority for the Conservative Movement and the institutions associated with it rests with the CJLS. The law committee has split on the status of homosexual behaviour according to Jewish law. Its rules and those of the Rabbinical Assembly regard each of the opinions authorized as equally legitimate. The ball is thus in our court with regard to the question of ordination of gays and lesbians at JTS.

We at JTS are not poskim. We will not be adjudicating matters of halachah. However, we are going to consider what we think best serves the Conservative Movement and larger American Jewish community. We know that the implications of the decision before us are immense. We fully recognize what is at stake.

We have the burden and privilege of this debate not because we are in the middle, but because of our commitment to Halachah on the one hand and full immersion in the culture and society of the present on the other hand. We are dedicated to thoughtful change as an essential element of tradition – which is not to say that the change proposed to us now is right or necessary, but that the process of considering it thoughtfully, whatever we eventually decide, is to us inescapable and welcome. One could say that such debate defines us – and that, well-conducted, it strengthens us. Of course, debate on this and similar matters has the potential to wound us as an institution and a movement. It also, however, has the power to remind us of what we stand for, and why despite our differences – or even because of them – we choose to stand together.

That is why I hope you will all join me in doing our very best to ensure that we do this right. I firmly believe that the way we discuss the matter in coming weeks may well have as great an effect on the future of JTS as whatever decision we eventually reach. Argument le-shem shamayim is for us a long and valued tradition. Never has it been more needed than now.

Opinions

Numbers and survival

Chanukah, our festival of lights, celebrates one of the earliest known struggles for religious freedom. Its presence (and its presents) in our North American lives is inflated due to the proximity of Christmas.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Yet, beyond its commercial and competitive value, it has vast potential significance for Jewish identity and continuity. The liturgy for the day (Al Hanissim) suggests the critical factor was not the oil but the miracle of the victory of a few over the many. Surely, in our history, this very fact – our ability to survive even when vastly outnumbered – has astonished us no less than it has our enemies.

We should face this festival, then, with a great sense of awe, as well as confidence. We survived. Although numbers do count, they don't predict or dictate the future. Yet our community is constantly concerned with crisis and numbers, and with prophesies of doom based on those numbers. Perhaps I am unduly optimistic, but the fact of our long-term endurance should be reflected somewhere in our sense of our personal identity and communal self-portrait. I would also argue that contrary to our panicked pessimists, we are in a better position today than we have ever been.

We weathered the lachrymose version of Jewish history (the valley of tears) and now need to overcome this doomsday tendency. We should examine the complete picture.

Despite assimilation, intermarriage and indifference, our bank account looks pretty good. Jews are still choosing to be identified as Jews. We are organized and our ethnic neighbours envy our institutional successes. We are wealthy in both material and human resources. There are numerous and diverse paths for institutional affiliation. Almost all Jewish children in North America have been exposed to some form of Jewish education. We have the most Jewishly educated population, ever.

As well, who would have predicted that thousands of adult Jews would choose Judaic studies in yeshivas and at university? Or that we would even have such university courses? The range of day schools is amazing and widespread. North American Jews largely support Israel and are supported by its presence. And while they're diverse, North American Jewish communities share significant commonalities.

Yes, there are problems. No, we should not ignore them. But we should also not cry wolf.

Compare 1900 with 2000, and even given the indescribable tragedy and trauma of the Holocaust, we are better off today. We are not dying. We want better education made available to all. We need stronger communal affiliations and interactions. We need to attract our youth to the dynamics of their heritage. But this is not a sinking ship.

So light the candles, celebrate our persistence and build the Jewish future. (And I highly recommend Calvin Goldscheider's book Studying the Jewish Future.)

Another side to the Chanukah story

It's time to light the menorah, eat latkes, cram sufganiyot and hand out gifts – small ones, mind you, not anything resembling the orgy of gift-giving of that other holiday (you know, the one with flying northern animals pulling a sleigh driven by a fat man in a jolly red suit).

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Is the story of Chanukah only the well-known tale of a famous miracle: valiant soldiers of Israel enter the Temple, find oil for the menorah lacking, and by supernatural will, the one-day supply lasts for the eight days needed to rededicate the holy site?

Or is there more to the story more richness, more nuance and more history than the simple child's tale?

In the Al Hanissim prayer, the patriarch Matityahu is called the son of Yochanan the High Priest. Well, no he wasn't. His family were priests all right, but not in line for the high priest job. In that simple misleading phrase begins a whole story. In fact, the oil miracle story is a prime example of the clash between the Hasmonean dynasty and the Pharisee/rabbinical class, as well as between the civilizations of the Greeks and the Jews.

My late teacher, Rabbi Samuel Schafler, taught that the Hellenistic period was most like the situation of our own day in North America, where we have flourished. Now, as in the time of Greek civilization, we struggle to maintain our Jewish identity while participating fully in the open, democratic society in which we live.

Choices for Jews in the Hellenistic world were equally challenging. On one side was Hellenistic civilization, a multicultural, multi-ethnic world in which citizens shared language, religious cults, economic opportunity and trade networks – all the benefits of a global civilization. On the other side was Judaism and Judean culture, which felt narrow, provincial, monolithic and just plain dull. No public art, no statue-lined colonnades, no Dionysian revels.

Which did the upper classes of Judean society prefer? The former, of course, and this slow assimilation into Hellenistic society appalled the traditionalists. Yet, ultimately, the Maccabean victory over the Syrian Greeks was more a result of the weakness of the Syrian Empire than of the might of the Judeans, although the "weak against the strong" image has much more attraction for us than the acknowledgement that our enemies were actually pretty weak themselves.

The rule of pagan foreigners may have been disrupted by the Hasmonean victory, but no sooner were they ensconced in power than they began to act like oriental Hellenistic rulers. A Jewish king had to be descended from the Davidic dynasty and a high priest descended from Aaron. In other words, church and state kept themselves to themselves – a first and important example of separation of church and state. Yet here came these upstarts and claimed both for themselves. The Hasmoneans proceeded to acquire both the kingship and the high priesthood.

Subsequently, they fell out with the rising Pharisaic class of scholars, whose intellectual heirs were the rabbis. Things got so bad that some Pharisees died at the hand of Alexander Yannai. The enemy was no longer Hellenizers, but had become the very family that had liberated the nation.

Judah the Maccabee's dedication of the Temple in 164 BCE had been consciously modeled on Solomon's ceremony, with eight days of feasting and fire as its symbol, as fire had descended on the altar for Solomon. Lights continued to be the public focus of the ceremony until it moved indoors to become a home-based ceremony.

However, when rabbis came to rule on customs associated with the festival, more than 200 years later, they chose – consciously – to associate the holiday with a miraculous persistence of the Temple lights through the eight-day period. Rules about how to light, what oils or candles to use, and the injunction not to make any use of the lights, moved the event from the realm of empire to the realm of the redemptive. The Hasmonean victory was diminished, the miracle elevated.

So while we give a nod to Matityahu and his sons' victories, we now focus on God's care for the children of Israel. Chanukah can be not only a tale of miracles and heroism, but also a caution to shun the temptations of absolute power.

Violence in the name of God, Pt. 2

Chanukah is the holiday of dreidels and latkes, candles and chocolate coins. We retell the story of the miraculous defeat of the large Assyrian army by a small band of Jews who fought for three long years to resist forced assimilation. The Maccabees probably thought that they put an end to religious oppression. They would be shocked and saddened to know that more than 2,300 years later, our world is still plagued by the shame of violence in the name of God.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

In my last column, I discussed the international conference Building World Peace: The Role of Religions and Human Rights, held in Edmonton this past October. The conference examined the widespread phenomenon of violence perpetrated in the name of religion. It also focused on the principle that organized religion should assume its proper role of countering hate and violence in an effort to bring about a better world.

Conference speakers discussed many instances of violence in the name of religion occurring throughout the world today, including the victimization of the Falun Gong in China and the animosity and religious sectarianism in Northern Ireland.

It is truly disturbing to note how many different countries and how many millions of people live with terrible realities. The continent of Africa is witness to the tragedies of abduction, brutality, rape, enslavement – and human life seems to have no value at all there. An eleven-year-long civil war, along with serious human rights violations, occurred in Sierra Leone, and the war between the government and the Lord's Resistance Army continues in northern Uganda. There was genocide in Rwanda in 1994; an estimated 800,000 Rwandans were killed. The current conflict in Sudan has led to starvation and genocide in the Darfur region.

With respect to Sudan, it is interesting to note the work of the Canadian Jewish Congress in attempting to alleviate the suffering of those victimized in that area.

Conference speakers such as Lt.-Gen. Roméo Dallaire, who is now a senator; former MP David Kilgour; Gen. John de Chastelain; and peace activists James Loney and Mary Lou and David Klassen passionately described their experiences and shared their visions for a better future.

Former grand chief of the Assembly of First Nations, Ovide Mercredi, talked about the continued violation of the rights of indigenous persons. Lois Wilson, former president of the World Council of Churches, discussed the political disenfranchisement of women.

This violence is complex and affects politics, economic relations, health and the environment. Some speakers addressed the privatization and shortage of water and the lack of sustainable development. Others referred to the HIV/AIDS epidemic and widespread hunger and disease.

It was pointed out that there are currently more than 45 dictatorships in countries throughout the world. According to Kilgour, these dictatorships "lack any… effective judiciary and rights… and oppose any spread of democratic ideals as an attack on state sovereignty."

The meeting did, however, have a positive agenda as 17 recommendations were brought forward to address some of the concerns. They included recommendations for increased and individual responsibility and for more public discourse about the issues that had been discussed at the conference.

With respect to religious traditions, Rabbi Lindsey bat Joseph and Karen Hamdon, a leader in the Muslim community, cautioned against the radicalization of religion. Speakers urged that moderates become the public faces of each religious tradition and that sacred texts be approached respectfully, but critically and cautiously. Faith communities were encouraged to join together in multifaith organizations throughout Canada.

The common thread, if any, was a desire for organized religions to take seriously the responsibility to act as forces for good, for healing, for peace and for understanding and reconciliation.

At Chanukah we say, "Neis gadol hayah sham." A great miracle happened there. The light from the small cruse of oil lasted for eight days and shines today in the Chanukah candles that we kindle. Some people feel that nothing short of a miracle would rid the world of violence in the name of religion. What we really need is for people to effect this change. It is time that the leaders of nations and various factions forgo policies of violence in the name of God and replace all the hate, suffering and killing with a new era of peace, understanding and respect.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

Chanukah, the Festival of Lights, casts an illuminating glow on a cornucopia of recently published books.

The Beta Israel, the Jews of Ethiopia, have been transformed since their resettlement in Israel, though the problems they have encountered have been daunting. Families that once dwelled in mud huts without clean running water now live in apartment buildings with modern conveniences. Boys and girls whose horizons were limited to remote villages in faraway provinces now find themselves in towns and cities where opportunities for a better life beckon.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Ricki Rosen, a photographer whose work has appeared in major international magazines, was inspiring by the flight of the Beta Israel from Ethiopia to Israel. Her book, Transformations: From Ethiopia to Israel (Gefen), is filled with striking, uplifting colour photographs of their journey to modernity. Rosen takes special interest in juxtaposing their former lives in Ethiopia with their present ones in Israel. The metamorphosis is nothing short of astonishing. As seen from this perspective, Israel is indeed a land where Jews of all colours have been ingathered. An essay by Micha Odenheimer, the founder of the Israel Association for Ethiopian Jews, is well worth reading.

Like the Ethiopian Jews, Jeffrey Goldberg – an American Jew – discovered Zion and made aliyah. Animated by romantic dreams of being an Israeli soldier, he ended up instead as a prison guard, keeping a wary eye on Palestinians who had been jailed during the first intifadah. This is where he met Rafiq, an Arab from the Gaza Strip with whom he forged an improbable friendship. It endures to this day and is the subject of Prisoners: A Muslim & A Jew Across the Middle East Divide (Alfred A. Knopf), a poignant book about the strength of human relations in the face of seemingly irreconcilable political differences.

Ariel Sharon, the former prime minister of Israel, lies comatose in a hospital, having been stricken by a massive stroke almost a year ago. His contributions are a matter of opinion, but Israeli sociologist Baruch Kimmerling, in Politicide: The Real Legacy of Ariel Sharon (Current Affairs), claims that his policies were geared toward one ultimate goal: wiping out the Palestinians as a "social, political and economic entity." This is a serious accusation, and while Kimmerling – a professor at the Hebrew University and the University of Toronto – is right about a number of things, he fails to support his main argument.

Is It Good for the Jews: The Crisis Of America's Israel Lobby (Random House), by neo-conservative journalist Stephen Schwartz, tackles a most sensitive issue – the accusation that the United States was pushed to invade Iraq in 2003 by certain Jewish lobbyists and by a cabal of right-wing Jewish officials in U.S. President George W. Bush's administration whose primary interest was to protect Israel. No shrinking violet, Schwartz addresses this volatile question and urges American Jews to take a hard, second look at the Republican party.

Robert Rosen, in Saving the Jews: Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Holocaust (Raincoast), argues with some success that the Roosevelt administration, far from being callous about the fate of Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe, actually did what it could under extreme circumstances to help them.

In Weimar in Exile: The Antifascist Emigration in Europe and America (Verso), Jean-Michel Palmier, a professor of esthetics at the University of Paris, has written a spendid account of the intellectuals, artists, writers and political figures who fled Nazi Germany and fought it tirelessly through their artistic and literary work.

The late Leon Goldensohn was an American physician and psychiatrist who was posted to Europe during and after World War War II. With Germany's defeat, he was entrusted with the task of monitoring the mental health of top-ranked Nazis, from Hans Frank to Julius Streicher, who had been involved in anti-Semitic agitation or in the implementation of the Holocaust. He recorded his conversations with them, and now they have been transcribed, edited and annotated by historian Robert Gellately in an excellent and revealing volume titled Nuremberg Interviews (Alfred A. Knopf).

Kati Marton, in The Great Escape (Simon & Schuster), documents the life and times of nine Hungarians who fled Nazism and left their respective marks on society. Her subjects run the gamut from nuclear physicist Edward Teller to photographer Robert Capa. Hungary's loss was obviously America's gain. Toronto writer Eric Koch arrived in Canada, via Germany and Britain, as an enemy alien in the midst of the war and was then stupidly confined to an internment camp on the flimsy pretext that he may have been an enemy agent. In fact, he was an assimilated German Jew who had been hounded out of his country by the Nazis. In I Remember the Location Exactly (Mosaic Press), a mélange of narrative, diary entries and excerpts from letters, he deftly recounts his adolescent years in Frankfurt and Cambridge and his rather hard landing in Canada.

After Hitler: Recivilizing Germans, 1945-1995 (Oxford University Press), by Konrad H. Jarausch, is a rigorous account of Germany's recovery from the long night of Nazism and its reintegration into the league of European nations. The fraught relationship between Polish Catholic identity, the Holocaust and Jews is Genevieve Zubrzycki's topic in The Crosses of Auschwitz: Nationalism and Religion in Post-Communist Poland (University of Chicago Press). The American playwright David Mamet, in The Wicked Son: Anti-Semitism, Self-Hatred and the Jews (Random House), asks a pointed question: Why do some Jews seek truth and meaning in other faiths, political movements and mindless entertainment, but not in Judaism itself? Judging by the title of the book, the answer is hardly surprising.

In A Vanished World: Muslims, Christians and Jews in Medieval Spain (Oxford University Press), Chris Lowney eruditely examines the dynamics that made coexistence possible before the late 15th century and suggests how Judaism, Islam and Christianity can coexist in an age of Islamic terrorism. Victor Erlich, a professor emeritus of Russian literature at Yale University and the grandson of murdered historian Simon Dubnov, has written a vivid personal memoir. Child of a Turbulent Century (Northwestern University Press) is set in Russia, Poland and the United States, and is never less than interesting.

Kafka: The Decisive Years (Harcourt), by Reiner Stach, richly evokes a period in the novelist's career when he dabbled with Zionism, considered marriage and wrote some of his finest works, including The Trial and Amerika. Emma Lazarus, the author and immigrant-rights activist whose soaring words are inscribed on the base of the Statue of Liberty in New York harbour, was a woman way ahead of her times. Esther Schor, in Emma Lazarus (Schocken), has written a full-bodied biography of this remarkable individual.

Franz Kafka

Jerome Kern, the scion of German Jewish immigrants, was the father of the American musical. His classic play Show Boat and his songs, ranging from Ol' Man River to Smoke Gets in Your Eyes, remain unforgettable. Stephen Banfield's Jerome Kern (Yale University Press), is a critical overview of his musical accomplishments, but as a biography, it is unfortunately pallid and lifeless.

Troubling the Waters: Black-Jewish Relations in the American Century (Princeton University Press), by Cheryl Lynn Greenberg, is sharp and incisive. A companion volume, The Price of Whiteness: Jews, Race and American Identity (Princeton University Press), by Eric L. Goldstein, adroitly traces Jews' often tumultuous encounter with race from the 1870s to the end of World War II.

Sliding to the Right: The Contest for the Future of American Jewish Orthodoxy (University of California Press), by Samuel C. Heilman, is an acute examination of Orthodox Jewry as it struggles to maintain traditions against the backdrop of secularization and contemporary American culture.

British journalist Nicholas Faith's The Bronfmans: The Rise and Fall of the House of Seagram (Thomas Dunne) takes this Canadian dynasty's amazing saga to the present day, while Brothers of Iron (Sports Publishing), by Joe and Ben Weider with Mike Steere, is the straightforward story of how two enterprising Montreal Jewish boys built a bodybuilding empire and athletic federation from scratch.

In general: Cooking maven Bonnie Stern's Heartsmart (Random House) bridges the gap between delicious food and healthy eating. Adventures of a Hollywood Secretary (University of California Press), by Valeria Belletti, is an insider's view of the film industry during the 1920s. The author, who was Samuel Goldwyn's secretary, is certainly a name dropper. Ted Barris' Behind the Glory: Canada's Role in the Allied Air War (Thomas Allen) is a fine historical work. Struck by Lightning: The Curious World of Probabilities (HarperCollins), by Jeffrey S. Rosenthal, is an eye-opener, as is Stewart Bell's Cold Terror: How Canada Nurtures and Exports Terrorism Around the World (Wiley). Coffee: A Dark History (HarperCollins), by Anthony Wild, is a potent brew of investigative journalism. Cyclists will love David V. Herlihy's Bicycle: The History (Yale University Press), the first comprehensive acccount on the subject.

Cancer survivor grateful to Israeli researcher

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

When Andy Faas, a semi-retired Toronto executive, was diagnosed with chronic myelogenous leukemia (CML) in 2005, he thought his life was over.

It turns out he was wrong.

Though CML, a rare form of bone-marrow cancer, used to be a death sentence for many of the 14,000 cases diagnosed yearly in North America, revolutionary research by Eli Canaani, an Israeli molecular biologist, has given hope back to those afflicted with the disease.

Instead of submitting to invasive treatments and suffering terrible side-effects, Faas simply takes one pill a day to control his cancer and suffers no ill effects from it.

Sponsored by the North American non-profit Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF), Canaani's work from 1981 to 1992 was instrumental in discovering a cancer-causing protein found in CML patients.

Canaani's research exposed what scientists term the "Philadelphia chromosome," as the one responsible for activating the deadly protein.

Once Canaani published his findings in 1985, subsequent work by the scientific community produced Gleevec, a drug sold by pharmaceutical giant Novartis, which specifically blocks the Philadelphia chromosome on a molecular level.

Gleevec was approved by both the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and Health Canada in 2001 for use in treating leukemia.

"CML used to be a fatal disease," Canaani said. "And prior treatments had terrible side effects."

Before Gleevec, patients were treated via cytotoxic drugs and bone marrow transplants; therapies that attacked all of a patient's cells instead of targeted ones.

According to Canaani, since 2001 nearly 80 per cent of patients treated with the drug are still alive and doing well.

Though its long-term effects remain unknown, this treatment has been hailed as a major breakthrough in the fight against cancer.

But it took almost 40 years to happen.

"It's unbelievable how long it took for Gleevec," Canaani said. "Starting in 1960 when two [scientists] in Philadelphia found an unknown chromosome in people with CML."

That's why Canaani and Faas both stress the pivotal role ICRF plays in helping make drugs like Gleevec possible.

ICRF is the largest source of private funding for cancer research in Israel, handing out more than 1,500 awards worth approximately $31 million (US) since 1977.

It has funded Canaani's work at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot for more than 25 years and continues to back Canaani's new forays into infant acute leukemia.

"It's approximately 30 per cent more cost effective to do research in Israel," said Brad Goldhar, ICRF's new Toronto chapter president.

"Israel is known for innovation," Goldhar said. "We are really excited that work in Israel is saving lives everywhere."

Faas, who is not Jewish, recently made a $350,000, seven-year donation to the ICRF out of gratitude for the fund's work in supporting cancer.

"I wanted to recognize the work that was done to help me," Faas said. "And to support further developments in Israel. They're a wonderful organization and the efficacy of the [research] done in Israel is superior to any other country."

Eli Canaani

But ICRF doesn't fund Israeli researchers indiscriminantly.

"ICRF gives grants not just to the best and brightest, but also to [research] that... will have the most impact on humanity in terms of saving lives, in a realistic time frame," said Joy Wagner, Toronto's ICRF executive director.

And Israel's scientific community has benefited tremendously as a result, said Canaani.

"I've felt it," he said. "The ICRF has been very influential on the ability of Israeli scientists to do work on cancer."

Born in Tiberias, Canaani received his PhD from the University of California at Berkeley in 1974.

He finished his post-doctoral work at the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda, Md., before returning to Israel in 1981.

Canaani believes that in the future, cancer-fighting drugs will be used to maintain the health of affected patients rather than provide absolute cures.

"One of the main thrusts in cancer research now is called 'rational therapy.' People are trying to repeat the success of Gleevec with other forms of cancer," he said. "The idea is not to cure, but to make it into a chronic [situation]."

Canaani travelled to Toronto last week at the behest of the ICRF, to help drum up more private funding from the community.

He was also invited to Faas's home for a private gathering.

"It is exciting and unusual," Canaani said of his impending visit with Faas.

"I started work on cancer in 1975, and it's rare to find that your work really touched [someone] and made an impression on the field and on a curé," he said.

When Faas was asked what he would say to the man whose research commuted his death sentence, he responded, "I will simply tell him, 'Thank you for saving my life.'"

Yad Vashem dinner to unite survivors, young adults

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sherri Rotstein and Shawna Spiegelman are planning their second "Dinner of Miracles" for young adults and Holocaust survivors.

The event, sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's new leadership division, will be held Dec. 18 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue to bring together the two groups in an informal way.

The two co-chairs, both 26 years old and grandchildren of survivors, came up with the idea about five years ago, when Rotstein – a teacher by training who is Toronto's March of the Living co-ordinator – was a committee member for Toronto's Holocaust Education Week, and Spiegelman was living in Montreal, studying at McGill University.

The result was the first Dinner of Miracles, held two years ago. About 60 survivors and 200 young adults in their 20s and 30s took part. Many of the survivors hadn't spoken to young people about their experiences before, Rotstein said.

"We wanted young adults to have the opportunity to talk to survivors in a more informal setting, without having to raise their hands to ask questions," she said.

Each table has six to eight young adults, a moderator and, usually, two survivors.

"It's a very intimate setting," said Spiegelman, the events co-ordinator for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center and a former March of the Living chaperone.

"We wanted to put a face to the [survivors'] stories and [have young adults] get to know the people."

Feedback from younger participants at the last dinner indicated that many had never had the opportunity to talk to survivors one-on-one about their experiences, or that they were intimidated about doing so.

In some cases, intergenerational relationships have developed, Spiegelman said.

The dinners are held during Chanukah.

"That's where the theme came from. We thought it would be a beautiful way to intertwine the two," said Spiegelman.

The co-chairs plan to publish stories of some of the survivors' own miracles in a program booklet for the evening.

They'd also like to make the dinner an annual event, because of the increasing age of participating survivors, the youngest of whom are in their 70s, Spiegelman said.

Even two years later, it's more challenging to find survivor participants, and some of the survivors who took part in the first dinner two years ago have died, she added. "It's devastating for us. It shows us that this dinner is so important.

"I think we're going to be the last generation to have first-hand accounts of what happened," she said. "That means it will be on our shoulders to carry it forward. I have a great passion for it. I think it's crucial to the future of the Jewish community."

For further information or to reserve tickets for the dinner, call 416-785-1333. Tickets are $30.

The 'radical hospitality experts'

By RABBI AVRAHAM PLOTKIN

In the recent edition of Reform Judaism magazine, Rabbi Eric Yoffe, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, identifies Chabad as the "Radical hospitality experts" of the Jewish community. He then encourages his members to learn from Chabad's warm and inviting culture.

He recommends that, following Chabad's example, laypeople should be trained and empowered to reach out to those on the fringes of the synagogue and to support their Jewish journeys.

"Spiritual communities," he says, "are not built with more adult lectures, better brochures and efficient administrators. They are built with caring relationships and very large doses of personal attention."

While I was very impressed with his open-minded recommendations and agree with them wholeheartedly, I don't believe it will turn out to be quite as easy as it appears. You see, the global hospitality practised by Chabad is actually the result of a passionate perspective and philosophy unique to the Chabad movement.

To emulate Chabad hospitality, one must also share their passion and perspective on life. Chabad rabbis and laypeople are trained with a unique set of values from a young age and are taught how to translate those values in real life. These values and philosophical underpinnings are what make the hospitality of the rabbis and constituents seem almost effortless and second nature.

So, what are the key values and philosophical underpinnings that make Chabad so hospitable and welcoming?

First and foremost is the unconditional love for a fellow Jew championed by the Lubavitcher Rebbe, of blessed memory. The Rebbe taught that a Jew is a Jew regardless of background, affiliation or level of observance.

"There is no such thing as a small Jew," the Rebbe wrote to a Jew in Curacao.

And to a famous American philanthropist he insisted that "every Jew has a glorious background – they are all the children of Abraham Isaac and Jacob."

Deep down at the very core of the Jew lies a spark of Godliness and goodness. The potential for Jewishness already exists. All we need to do is nurture it. This non-judgmental approach and positive belief in the Jewish potential is key to successful outreach and hospitality.

Furthermore, Chabad Chassidim are taught that helping fellow Jews with their material and spiritual needs is of the highest order. The focus here is not on making people religious or building large organizations or memberships, although that would be nice. The main concern is simply helping a fellow Jew in the spirit of "ahavat Yisrael" (love of Israel). This unconditional assistance is recognized by others and reciprocated.

Finally, Chabad has a messianic sense of urgency in bringing about tikkun olam – literally fixing the world. Every good deed or act of hospitality is seen as another possibility to tip the scales and change the world permanently for good. A mitzvah is viewed not just as another good deed but also as a catalyst to bring about global and historic change. One more act of hospitality can be the "final straw" to usher in a new era of peace and happiness for the entire world. What can be more motivational than that?

You see, copying Chabad is not just a matter of reorganizing and becoming more hospitable. It's also about changing an entire outlook on Jewish life itself.

Rabbi Avraham Plotkin is the spiritual leader of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham in Markham, Ont.

Gay hate and voodoo Judaism

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Ha'aretz, Israel's leading newspaper, recently published an astonishing article about gay-hate in Jerusalem. It seems that leaders of both the haredi community and the gay community were working overtime to avoid the predictable anger and the possibility of violence over a planned gay pride parade in Jerusalem. As unlikely partners as they may have been, gay activists made sure the parade did not take place in a religious neighbourhood, while haredi leaders tried valiantly to curb overzealous youths from pelting police officers.

Fade out from that fuzzy picture of strained and strange co-operation to the next scene, at a rabbinical court. Haredi leaders were talking about placing a "curse" – yes a curse – on the police who "beat up" haredi Jews, and on the organizers of the parade. The civil courts of a democratic Jerusalem determined that this parade could take place, and "voodoo Judaism" – a kind of primitive quasi-spiritual excuse for dangerous superstition – was the response.

The curse in question is called Pulsa denura – "whip of fire" in Aramaic – and has its origins in Kabbalah. (Another reason to be careful when you study modern "pop" Kabbalah, a la Madonna.) It's intended to cause the death of a subject by calling upon the angels of destruction to refrain from forgiving the subject their sins, while calling down all the curses named in the Bible.

"Fringe" behaviour, you ask? Perhaps. But a pulsa denura was placed on former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was later assassinated, and upon one of his successors, Ariel Sharon, whose coma led to rejoicing by those who had "prophesied" his downfall and asked the Angel of Death to take him.

What kind of religious system supports such "fringe" behaviour? In the Diaspora, this might be Purim Torah. In Israel, it's everyday news. As the saying goes in Israel, "You haven't made it in Israeli politics until you've been cursed by the Pulsa denura."

Excommunication didn't end with Spinoza, and some of us have been excommunicated with the best. But it's no wonder most secular Israelis don't want to have anything to do with Judaism when this is what we present: a Judaism of "black magic," supported by a fundamentalism that believes it's obligated to ensure the downfall of those it fears or opposes.

I don't know about you, but this is not the Judaism I practise, nor is it the Judaism I want to teach others. It's certainly not a Judaism that I could offer in my "outreach" classes to the scores of unaffiliated Jews who don't get us at the best of times. It's a Judaism of hatred, Jew against Jew, which led, our rabbis remind us, to the destruction of the Temple itself – that very same Temple whose rededication we celebrate on Chanukah.

This time it's hatred against gay Jews, but next time it will be against some other kind of "Other."

In this "season of light," and at a time when the darkness sometimes seems like it will swallow us up, we should insist that Judaism be a force for light in this world.

But before we can be an or lagoyim – a light unto the nations we have to be a light unto ourselves. We can't do that unless we question those leaders who would bring us back to the Dark Ages.

Jewish Life

Final, and not-so-final, sales

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

One of the challenges facing retailers during the frantic holiday season is dealing with returns of merchandise. A recent study indicated that up to one-third of all purchases are returned after the holidays. Included in that amount are fraudulent returns, as customers buy items with the intent of using them once before returning them. Besides the obvious issues of theft and deception, such activity undermines the entire structure of business.

In this vein, the Talmud (Bava Batra 88b) teaches that dishonesty in weights and measures – i.e. business fraud – is "more difficult" than sexual immorality. While the latter is a capital offence, its impact on society as a whole is much less than the inability to conduct business in an honest environment.

The economic backwardness and poverty that is the lot of many Third World countries is in a large measure due to their business practices. With bribery, fraud, corruption and kickbacks all too common, the ultimate effect is an impoverished society. Thankfully, in North America, while the practice of business ethics is far from perfect, the general environment is one in which honesty generally prevails and those who try to cheat the system are pursued by the law.

After I penned these words, I read in the Globe and Mail (Dec. 5) about a Gallup study that said "endemic and institutional corruption impedes a country's stability and growth, making it difficult for countries to tap into much-needed foreign investment and aid opportunities… It also has a huge effect on the people living in these countries, diminishing their [faith] in their leaders, reducing their incentive to work hard, and making entrepreneurial efforts and civic engagement less likely." While economists don't measure the ethical output of countries, it's clear that economic growth depends on moral growth.

The Mishnah (Bava Metzia 3:2), in expressing its revulsion at those who take – even if technically legal – advantage of the toil and effort of others, asks rhetorically "how can one conduct business using the cow [i.e. property] of another?" It's this principle that generally prohibits an employee from taking clients with them when they establish their own business.

Of course, most returns of goods are not fraudulent and represent shifting assessments of perceived needs. Nonetheless, the Jewish legal system states that all sales are final, the only exceptions being claims of price fraud. Price discrepancies from the market norm of more than one-sixth allow the aggrieved party to void the sale. But even here, there is a very short window of opportunity to make this claim, corresponding to the minimum amount of time needed to verify the legitimacy of the transaction with an expert, which in Talmudic times might have meant as little as a couple of hours. As investors know all too well, the stock market hates uncertainty and so do retailers. Not knowing until weeks later if one has truly made a sale can be quite disconcerting. The Mishnah relates (Bava Metzia3:3) that the merchants of Lod rejected the opinion that price fraud is only actionable at a discrepancy of one-third, as that same opinion allowed returns for the entire day.

A policy in which sales are final eliminates the concern of people using an object temporarily with the intention of returning it at a later date. Of course, merchants may voluntarily waive their rights to certainty in sales. The Talmud terms such concessions as the mark of piety.

It seems to me that consumers have benefited from an environment in which competitive pressures have led to greater displays of piety.

Tzedakah and justice

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Rosh Hashanah is well behind us. But another new year draws near and with it the last-minute impulse to donate to charity. I'd like to look at some of the sites on the Internet where you can pick up a good background in charity and perhaps then even leave some tzedakah behind.

Actually, charity really isn't a very good translation of the word "tzedakah." As Judaism 101 points out, "The word 'tzedakah' is derived from the Hebrew root tzade-dalet-qof, meaning righteousness, justice or fairness. In Judaism, giving to the poor is not viewed as a generous, magnanimous act; it is simply an act of justice and righteousness, the performance of a duty, giving the poor their due." [www. jewfaq.org/tzedakah.htm]

In an interesting overview of The Economics of Tzedakah, Rabbi Gary M. Bretton-Garanatoor, of New York's Stephen Wise Free Synagogue, looks at the example set by Abraham. "We know little of Abraham's early life, and one might wonder why Abraham was singled out to become God's partner in the Covenant. We learn from the text that 'Vayach'shveha lo tzedakah – God considered Abraham on account of his righteousness.' (Genesis 15:6) [http://tinyurl.com/yxvzou] Throughout the Torah, tzedakah, acts of righteousness, are tied to the Hebrew term mishpat legal justice – so that we learn that doing what is right and just is a legal obligation." [http://tinyurl.com/u6zhy]

The Just-Tzedakah website has a detailed look at giving from a Jewish point of view. While the theoretical halachic minimum for giving is about $2, this only applies to someone who is living in poverty. The site suggests that most people contribute 10 to 20 per cent of a year's net income. Other tzedakah recommendations from the site: calculate your obligation with care, don't brag and avoid delay. [http://tinyurl.com/yez8vg]

There is an interesting discussion about how you should feel about giving tzedakah. Eliezer Abrahamson notes that "if one gives tzedakah to a poor person with a sour and unpleasant face, then he loses any merit from it, even if he gives 'a thousand golden coins.' Tzedakah must be given in a pleasant and compassionate manner… If you have nothing to give, you should appease the poor person with words." [http://home.aol.com/lazera/tzedaka.htm]

Dennis Prager notes that not feeling like giving is no excuse. "Judaism would love you to give 10 per cent of your income each year from your heart. It suspects, however, that in a large majority of cases, were we to wait for people's hearts to prompt them to give a 10th of their money away, we would be waiting a very long time. Ergo, Judaism says, 'Give 10 per cent – and if your heart catches up, terrific. In the meantime, good has been done.'" [http://tinyurl.com/y46us3]

Speaking of attitude, take a look at Arthur Kurzweil's Brother, Can You Spare a Dime: The Treatment of Beggars According to Jewish Tradition. Kurzweil says that although "the organized Jewish community has gotten the mitzvah of giving tzedakah down to a virtual science," he has always been confused and inconsistent in his treatment of beggars. He poses 15 questions such as "What if they are all fakes or frauds," "Shouldn't these beggars be supported by official agencies?" and "Should I buy them a cup of coffee because they'll probably spend it on booze anyway?" Kurzweil, who is not a rabbi but a well-known Jewish genealogist, clearly spent a great deal of effort sifting through traditional sources, which clearly demand compassion for the needy. [www.ajritz.com/jew/brother.htm]

As with any serious issue, Judaism is not above finding the light side. In his essay Why Is There a Need for Tzedakah? Rabbi Louis Jacobs retells a popular Jewish tale. "When a rich man excuses the small size of his donation by protesting that he is unable to afford to give more generously because he has been obliged to pay his son's gambling debts, the poor man retorts: 'If your son wants to gamble let him do so with his own money, not with mine.'" [http://tinyurl.com/yh4rng]

Benefactors of Meir Medical Centre honoured

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Some 350 Christians and Jews gathered at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue recently to pay tribute to two benefactors of the Meir Medical Center (MMC) in Kfar Saba at a celebration marking the hospital's 50th anniversary.

Hosted by Canadian Friends of MMC, the dinner honoured two "pillars of strength"– philanthropist Rose Ziner, honorary chair of the Jewish National Fund, and Donna Holbrook, a national director of the International Christian Embassy (ICE) in Jerusalem.

A supporter of many Israeli causes, Holbrook is also a founding member of Canadians Against Anti-Semitism and Anti-Semitism Must End Now. She and her husband, Richard, were the main donors at the jubilee dinner, which raised more than $300,000 for the expansion of the intensive care unit.

Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, called Ziner and Holbrook "women of valour." Harriet Morton, who co-chaired the dinner with Gabriel Regev, referred to them as "women of vision."

While noting Ziner and Holbrook's cultural differences, Morton emphasized the honorees' common values, their strong commitment to the State of Israel. "They are bound together with their love, dedication and commitment to the survival and continuity of Israel," she said.

Israeli Consul General Ya'acov Brosh and Dr. Ehud Davidson, CEO of MMC, were on hand to pay tribute to the two women. Actor Harvey Atkin served as the MC and auctioneer.

Morton told The CJN that it was important for the Jewish community to recognize the contributions made to Israel by Christian supporters.

Indeed, Holbrook spoke at length about her deep affection for the Jewish state. "Once you've been to Israel, one wants to return and return and return again," she said.

She noted that ICE is the only embassy in Jerusalem. "Other nations moved their embassies to Tel Aviv. Not this embassy – we stand in support of Israel."

Holbrook said the Christian embassy does outreach work with new immigrants. "If they need money for apartments, education, food… we get involved in absorbing new immigrants.

"We can be a bridge in a land rocked with conflict."

Ziner, a Holocaust survivor, stressed the importance of maintaining a strong Israel, because had there been a Jewish homeland, 1.5 million Jewish children would not have been murdered by Hitler, she said.

Davidson spoke about MMC's work with trauma patients. He said that because of its proximity to the Green Line, Israel's pre-Six Day War border, the hospital has seen a high percentage of victims of terrorist attacks and over the years, it has established a solid reputation as an important trauma centre.

The goal of the campaign for the hospital is to raise $2.6 million to expand the intensive care unit from six to 12 beds.

For more information about MMC, call 905-770-5118.

CAREER DAY: As part of its fundraising efforts, Associated Hebrew School's Posluns campus student council organized Career Day recently. Students dressed up as whatever they want to be when they grow up. Money raised was donated to the John Howard Society, which helps ex-convicts re-integrate into society. Inspire your kids, TV rabbi advises

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

The "sex talk" is not the most important conversation to have with your kids, says author Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, author of the book Kosher Sex and host of the Learning Channel's reality show Shalom in the Home.

The best talks are about inspiration.

"Why would I talk to kids about sex? How effective is it? Has it done anything?" he asked during a recent visit to Toronto to promote his book 10 Conversations You Need to Have With Your Children.

Parents dread the three "stock" conversations: don't do drugs, don't get an STD, don't get pregnant, he said. "These are the most depressing, morbid conversations…We're essentially telling our kids 'don't die.'"

In the book, Rabbi Boteach writes that "telling our children what we want them to be" invites rebellion, so the book helps parents offer "an image of what they want to be: their own inner voice of conscience."

On one episode of Shalom in the Home, Rabbi Boteach counselled a 16-year-old who "did nothing but… paint her toenails" while her mother worked in the background.

Instead of confronting her, Rabbi Boteach, a father of eight, asked her, "What do you want to be?"

The girl replied, "A fashion designer."

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach
[Seth Olenick photo]

Rabbi Boteach explained the difference between what you do and who you are. "There are only two answers – a good person or a bad person."

Watching a video of herself lounging as her mother scrubbed, the girl saw what she was becoming.

"You're not a good person if you make you mother into your dishwasher," Rabbi Boteach told her. "You're only 16 and you've already lost control of your life."

The best approach to influencing kids is by sharing values, he told The CJN.

"We have an RV, we go into nature, [we] go to all the important historic sites," he said of his own family life.

But his best advice for inspiring kids is to turn off the TV.

"Most TV is stupid. Most reality TV is degrading," he said. "Most TV counsellors think their job is to… point out that you're a jackass. The counsellor portrays himself as Jesus – 'I'm perfect, you're not. I'll tell you what to do.'"

In Judaism, righteousness is about struggle, not perfection, he said, adding that our heroes, such as Moses and Abraham, are flawed, so we can relate to them.

In the same way, Rabbi Boteach seeks commonalties with the families on his show.

"We're all faced with the same challenges," he said. "They have disciplinary issues… I can have disciplinary issues with my kids."

Rabbi Boteach said he's proud of his show, which he contends has integrity and sticks to its mandate of helping families in crisis.

He said he spends 70 hours with each family over the course of one week, and the show condenses that into one hour.

"You can do a heck of a lot in a week," he said.

But does his being a rabbi deter non-Jews? "They don't care what my title is… they judge me by a single criterion: can I help them?"

Only Jews might hesitate to hand their troubles to a rabbi, he said. "Jews… denigrate themselves and their faith by thinking they have nothing to say to the outside world."

Rabbi Boteach said that his dream "from the age of 16 was to grant Judaism a seat at the table… Christianity and Islam shaped the modern world, yet both are daughter religions of Judaism."

If there's one common thread to his many books, columns, and TV and radio shows, it's that Jews need to breach our insularity and reclaim Judaism's global influence.

As on Shalom in the Home, in 10 Conversations, Rabbi Boteach tries to translate Jewish wisdom for Jews and non-Jews alike – with words that will heal not just children, but entire families.

In our society, marriages are failing from boredom, he said. "We call marriage 'settling down'… we accept the drudgery.

"Husbands and wives don't inspire each other. Parents don't try to inspire their kids… they don't make each other laugh, don't share their innermost self… They have very functional lives which are very boring."

Though 10 Conversations draws some examples from his show, most are from his own personal experience.

"I actually sat down with a tape recorder… and [recorded] the conversations I have with my kids, the 10 most important values I want to communicate."

Whether it's reading Torah or rollerblading with his kids, Rabbi Boteach says his parenting owes much to his experience as a camp counsellor when he was younger.

"In the same way that a camp counsellor moves all the kids in a bunk, a parent can easily move all the kids he has to," he said

"Camp has a lot of discipline, a lot of rules – so why do kids want to go?" he asked rhetorically. "Because it's inspiring."

Flyer angers leaders

Jewish leaders and other Muslim leaders expressed outrage and disappointment at the flyer.

MCC communications director, Sohail Raza called it immature.

"I think it was a rather childish way of getting a point across," Raza said. "If you have a comment to make or a statement to be understood, you should do it in a more democratic, mature manner."

Raza added that there is no room in the Canadian political process for "outside politics" to enter into the debate.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan, who received the flyer in an e-mail a couple of days after the convention, was harsher in his criticism.

"I think this is ethnic identity politics at its absolute worst," he said. "To announce that [Arlene Perly Rae] is vice-president of the CJC is just a thinly veiled means of announcing that Bob Rae is married to a Jew. It doesn't say anything else. It does not say anything about Bob Rae's politics [or] Arlene's Middle East politics."

It seems that the MCC was aware early on of people who were trying to hijack the convention for their own causes.

On Nov. 27, in the run-up to the Montreal event, the MCC's website warned candidates to beware of "self-styled leaders from the Muslim community… making false representations to Liberal leadership hopefuls by suggesting they control Muslim delegate votes at this week's Liberal Party convention."

In the same article, Salma Siddiqui, vice-president of the MCC and a Michael Ignatieff delegate, was quoted as saying, "We urge Muslim Liberal delegates to vote according to their conscience and not be bullied by the dictates of those who represent the the interests of Saudi Arabia and Iran in Canada."

Morgan said he hopes the e-mail flyer incident isn't a sign of things to come from the Liberal party, and he said he doesn't rule out dialogue with Muslim organizations and MPs.

"I will speak to people in the Liberal party to make sure that this type of contaminated discourse does not spread within the party," he said.

Morgan added that he hopes to contact several prominent Muslim politicians in the Liberal party "whom I respect and will be speaking to."

One of those is Omar Alghabra, MP for Mississauga-Erindale and the CAF's immediate past-president.

Morgan said that Alghabra "is collegial and open to discussion. We don't always agree, but we always manage to discuss."

Alghabra also criticized the flyer and its timing.

"Associating racial or religious background to political stances… it's the last thing we need in the Arab-Jewish relationship," he said. "And it does a disservice to us as Canadians."

Alghabra said he never saw the flyer at the convention. He viewed it for the first time after a friend e-mailed him a copy after reading Fatah's article.

Calls to Fatah were not immediately returned.

Parents told to keep eyes open for drug use

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

On the most part, teens who experiment with drugs move on to a healthier lifestyle, says a Chicago-based clinical psychologist who specializes in adolescent and family therapy.

"Sometimes, though, they go over the top and parents don't want to see it. [My] message is that we need to worry, and we need to open our eyes and look for signs," Dr. Jerry Lob said at a recent lecture and panel discussion sponsored by Jewish Family Institute and supported by JACS, Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically-Dependent Persons and Significant Others.

He said that when he was growing up, kids were not "assaulted on all sides" the way they are now.

'We must not be in denial'

"Ricky and Lucy slept [in separate beds] on I Love Lucy, and when she became pregnant it broke a boundary. Now kids have the Internet, which can be a scary place," Lob said.

"As parents, we have a responsibility. We cannot abdicate our parental role."

Lob, who has five sons and is in "the middle of the teenage years," said that "a smart parent can give their children space but continue to hold on.

"We must not be in denial. [Be aware of] red eyes, sleep disturbance or sudden moodiness. Should you check your child's e-mails or diary? My only answer is that each child is different. Trust them until you have reason not to."

In order to build a relationship, he said, "your child needs to view you as a safe person. Can they talk to you without [you] freaking? Are all your comments negative?"

A good way to bond with teens is to ask them about their music.

"In order to share a conversation, you need a context. Once you talk about the easier stuff, you can move on to the harder stuff," Lob said.

"The first real conversation cannot be about cigarettes, drugs and alcohol. You have to talk about something easy first."

The cornerstone of parenting is to "let your child know their dignity will never be demeaned," he said.

"Each child has to be parented differently. All children need to know that we are appreciative of them, [even if] that is a challenge. Kids with high self-esteem have an easier time saying 'no.'"

In all of human history, Lob said, "parents have never been able to stop their children from having a bad friend. It is not up to us to do that. Don't trash their friends. When you put their friends down, you put them down."

Never, he stressed, take revenge on your children, "or anyone else for that matter. If they hurt you, don't hurt them back. Tell them in a strong voice that their actions are unacceptable, and unless the relationship is damaged, they will always care.

"Don't be sarcastic or speak in a demeaning tone of voice. Your kid will know you have not stepped over the line, and that is how a relationship goes forward. How we talk to each other when we're angry [says a lot.] They'll know you're angry, but they'll [also] know they're still safe."

What goes into the core of our being, he said, "is if dad or mom slapped us verbally or physically. Kids need to know their family is a safe harbour."

CHAT graduate Danny Richmond spurring social change

Where Are They Now?

Since Toronto's Jewish school system was established decades ago, thousands of its graduates have gone on to achieve enormous success in business, public life, and community affairs. In this feature, we profile one such success story.

By A.M. Segal

When AIDS was still a fairly taboo subject, a few students at Bialik Hebrew Day School took the unprecedented step of launching an awareness campaign about the illness.

The endeavour made an indelible impression on a Bialik student named Danny Richmond.

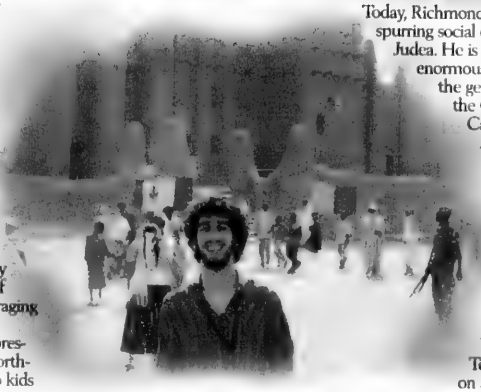
"I think we were all enhanced by the experience in many ways," Richmond recalls. "The students were way ahead of their time and the school should be applauded for encouraging such initiatives."

Fast forward to 2004 when Richmond followed the impressive example set by his childhood peers by travelling to northern Ghana, where he volunteered at a centre dedicated to kids whose parents lost their lives to HIV/AIDS.

"I fell in love with Northern Ghana and the children at the centre," Richmond enthuses.

Since that time, Richmond has given 80-plus presentations about HIV/AIDS and global citizenship to more than 10,000 youth throughout Ontario.

"The most important thing we did was educate thousands of youth, community members and workers about HIV/AIDS," he explained. "It has left me with an incredible impression of what education systems can do."



Danny Richmond poses in Algeria, one of the stops he made as a participant on a recent three-week mission with Canada's Governor General Michaelle Jean.

Today, Richmond continues to be driven by the importance of education in spurring social change as the national program director of Canadian Young Judea. He is also a renowned leader of community projects tackling such enormous issues as homelessness, environmentalism, land mines and the genocide in Darfur. His hands-on activism recently garnered the CHAT graduate the distinguished honour of accompanying Canada's Governor General Michaelle Jean on a state visit to Africa.

Richmond was one of only two Canadian youths selected for the mission, which spent more than three weeks in Algeria, Mali, Ghana, South Africa and Morocco.

"Our role is to assist the Governor General in exploring Canadians' roles in partnering with Africans in development, as well as to shed light on the progress of these specific African nations," he reveals. "I have reconfirmed my notion that Africa is not hopeless and that there is incredible work being done to raise their living standards."

Now back in Canada, Richmond has his sights set on a litany of social causes.

To that end, he will soon be leading 22 high school students on a mission to Argentina, will be helping to enhance the public profile of the Canadian International Development Agency and is eager to engage in tikkun olam projects with schools. The focus on youth is anchored in Richmond's belief that this group of people is full of latent potential which he wants to develop for the greater good of all humanity.

"There is a moral absolute in youth," Richmond opines. "Often, this is sneered at, but it should be cherished and engaged. They are so incredibly creative and they are able to think abstractly. I'm just simply trying to be a spark for youth to start realizing that."

Joint programs open students' eyes to different perspectives

By Carla Lancit

A Jewish day school is a community unto itself, but, as many Toronto area students are learning, it is also part of a larger community.

"Holding joint programs is one way in which we assert again that we are members of a broader Jewish community," says Rabbi Elliott Diamond, vice principal, Limudei Kodesh, at Netivot Ha'Torah. "While there are things that distinguish and divide us, there are many commonalities that we share. We want our kids to understand those commonalities."

Netivot HaTorah holds many programs with their immediate neighbour, Leo Baeck Day School. The two schools co-sponsored a speaker for a Holocaust Education Week event, which was attended by students from Shearim as well.

At Purim, they have a mishloach manot exchange—an activity that Leo Baeck's south campus holds with USDS.

This year, the northern campuses of Netivot Ha'Torah, Leo Baeck, and Associated Hebrew Day School held a joint march for Yom Ha'atzmaut. More than 400 grade four and five students participated in the event. The Netivot HaTorah and Leo Baeck students paraded up Atkinson to Associated, where students from all three schools made presentations and spent an hour singing and dancing together.

Students from Netivot Ha Torah, Leo Baeck and Associated Hebrew School came together this year for a joint march in celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"These events allow the kids to mix, see what the differences are, see what the similarities are, and break down stereotypes," says David Prashker, director of Leo Baeck Day School. "Even these small opportunities to enable children to see different perspectives is terribly important as part of their education. Our goal is to bring up children who can make informed choices about their Jewish identity and their Canadian identity. You can only make informed choices from an educated perspective. Meeting children who have a different perspective on Judaism, who think about it differently, who practice it differently, who even dress differently, opens their eyes to different perspectives."

But above all, the joint programs are fun. "The kids seem to really enjoy it," says Diamond. "It's always exciting for them to meet kids from other schools. It exposes them to the commonalities of the broader Jewish community."

October's BJE Jewish education fair paying dividends

By Raquel Kaplan Goldberg

The abundance of Jewish education options in the GTA can be overwhelming for both first-time and more experienced parents. So, to help them navigate the many offerings, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and its Jewish Information Service of Toronto (JIST) provided parents and grandparents with a unique opportunity to speak with representatives from 30 day, supplementary, and pre schools, all under one roof.

The Jewish Education Fair - held on October 23 - attracted 350 parents and grandparents to the Tanenbaum CHAT Wilmington campus, many of whom benefited from the evening.

Ann Rastin, who attended the fair with her husband Joe and her mother Faigie Libman, left with a better idea of which schools were appropriate for her two-and-a-half-year-old son Tyler. "I had narrowed it down before the fair to three schools and when I got there I found out more information that helped me narrow it down to two," she said. "It was a very well spent evening."

The schools benefited as well from the exposure the fair provided. Joan Schoenfeld, principal of the Downtown Jewish Community School, was "delighted to meet several families from downtown that, had it not been for the fair, would not have known about our school. It was a terrific opportunity for parents to compile information and make a more educated decision."

"We see this interface between the families and the schools as an important first step in the right choice for each individual child," said Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's senior vice-president for Jewish Education and Identity.

Over 350 parents and grandparents attended October's Jewish Education Fair sponsored by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education and Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto.

Supplementary education choices more varied than ever before

By Carla Lanclt

With interests ranging from Israel, to family learning, to Jewish living, a new crop of supplementary schools around the Greater Toronto Area is catering to today's diverse Jewish schoolchildren with innovative and exciting programming.

One of the community's newest ventures in education is Kachol Lavan. The school, which targets Israeli families, teaches Hebrew and Israeli studies. Still in its first year, Kachol Lavan already boasts 84 students, some of whom come from as far as Brampton and Oakville every Sunday.

"We want to provide our children with a little bit of Israeli culture," says David Zaltzman, who co-founded the school together with Amir Freund.

The school, which is hosted at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill, does so by teaching students to speak, read, write, and perform in Hebrew, and by including lessons on Israel and Israeli culture.

Beth Radom Congregation has counteracted the challenges of a sprawling membership with a program that combines satellite learning and family learning sessions.

The program, called Jumpin' for Judaism, groups students for weekly tutor-led Hebrew classes that rotate among their homes. "The advantage of small groups is that we can give individual attention," says the synagogue's cantor and director of education David Rosen.

Every other Sunday the whole group gathers for Judaic studies sessions. "We make it a creative atmosphere so they're not learning Judaism out of a book, but learning by doing," says Rosen.

For the Reform Educators Council of Toronto, blending formal and informal education is vital. The group runs an overnight program for students in grades four and five, and a retreat for grade six students. An upcoming program for grade 11 and 12 students will prepare them for life outside of their community.

"We're really not schools," says Dr. Ira Schweitzer, Director of Education for Temple Sinai of Toronto. "We are really more like a cultural environment, trying to acculturate our youth and families into Jewish living with a knowledge base."

At Solel Congregation of Mississauga, parents serve as mentors and teachers for the religious school's 185 students.

"We take to heart the words of Deuteronomy—Veshinantam Levanecha, And you shall teach them (your children) diligently—and it works," says director of education Arliene Botnick. "Our parents are committed to keeping this Jewish community vibrant, involved and knowledgeable."

At the Hillel Children's Workshop, the emphasis is on family learning. Each Sunday morning starts with an optional Hebrew class. Then, while the school's 60 children are learning about Bible stories, Jewish communities around the world, or Jewish history, their parents have their own classes. The adult topics range from a discussion of Canadian immigration policy in the twentieth century and its discriminatory attitudes towards racial/ethnic minorities to a discussion on Klezmer music with musical demonstrations.

"One of the most impressive parts of the program is the enthusiasm and attendance from the parents and the children," says Abby Robins, the workshop's public relations chair. "The parents are a very bright, well-educated group who really want to be there, learning and sharing their opinions."

As diverse as these programs are, they all have one thing in common—they are educating a new generation of knowledgeable, committed Jews.

Israel's Indiana Jones shares adventurous life with BJE teachers

By A.M. Segal

Digging deep beneath the ground to try and unearth treasures from our ancient past has been Dan Bahat's business for nearly half a century.

The acclaimed Israeli archeologist is currently juggling writing a book with lecturing at Tel Aviv's Bar-Ilan University and teaching a semester to mostly theology students at the University of Toronto's St. Michael's College.

Acclaimed Israeli archeologist Dr. Dan Bahat.

He recently gave a passionate presentation about his specialty, the tunnels of the Western Wall, during a UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) professional development day.

"I told the teachers about my excavations along the Western Wall and the discovery of the remains of three ancient mikvehs by the Temple Mount," he reveals. "These date back to the second temple period."

Such illuminating findings still seem to excite this 68-year-old trailblazer with the same vigour they did when he first started excavating in the early1960s.

Back then, Bahat was a student at the Hebrew University and made quite an impression on his older, more experienced colleagues.

"I had just finished my BA and I was the youngest of all archeologists working on an area of Masada that was thought to be the least important," he relates. "But it turned out to be very important because we discovered 10 pieces of pottery which bear the names of Jewish troops from that period."

At the time, rather than be defeated by the Romans, the Jewish combatants committed suicide by jumping from Masada, a fortress on top of a rock plateau overlooking the Dead Sea.

Bahat developed a keen interest in Jerusalem and following the Six Day War in 1967, when Israel captured the Old City, the archeologist began to dig by the Western Wall.

"This was the first time in history that we had the liberty to dig wherever we wanted," he recalls.

Bahat engaged in numerous excavations in Jerusalem throughout the 1970s, including the site of Herod's palace, and in 1985, he became the district archeologist of Jerusalem.

Along the way, Bahat has written several books and garnered the prestigious Jerusalem Prize in Archeology.

His explorations and findings have drawn comparisons to the fictional movie character Indiana Jones, who searched for the famed Ark of the Covenant.

Modestly shoving aside these comparisons, the bushy moustached archeologist says it isn't just the big discoveries that provides the thrill, but also the quest.

"I don't expect to make finds," he explains. "But I am happy with what I find because it makes me able to analyze my interests, which is what did ancient Jerusalem look like."

While Bahat, a grandfather, could very well be easing into his retirement years, he remains immersed in his studies. "Now that I'm 68, I feel I'm at the climax of my abilities," he relates. "I love to teach and I always get high marks from the students."

Fresh insights and contradictory ideas

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The journalist's capacity to think clearly about Mideast complexities is constantly being challenged by inconsistent, shifting and even contradictory analytical trends. Sometimes, conflicting ideas appear in the very same article.

For instance, Steven Gutkin, Associated Press bureau chief for Israel and the PA-controlled territories, wrote on Dec. 2 about problems between Fatah and Hamas as their unity government talks reached an impasse. Gutkin's article appeared in the International Herald Tribune under the title "Ceasefire and Olmert speech fuel peace hopes, but Hamas now holds the cards."

Gutkin said that many people believe that progress on the Israeli-Palestinian front is the key to resolving regional problems, but Hamas' refusal to agree to the formation of a Palestinian national unity government is stymieing such progress.

Gutkin concludes by noting that "several Fatah officials said they believe that a possible decision by the Bush administration to open a dialogue with Syria and Iran could help ease Israeli-Palestinian relations by reducing outside support for local extremists."

Gutkin was apparently referring to the fact that Hamas' political leadership resides not in the territories, but in Damascus – in the office of Khaled Meshal – and is heavily influenced and supported by the rejectionists in Tehran.

Thus, some continue to argue that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the key to solving the problems of the Middle East – especially in Iraq – an argument disparaged in some quarters. (Martin Peretz, editor of the New Republic, is especially scornful of this viewpoint, as reported in last week's column.) Others, however, argue that a pre-condition for moving ahead on the Israeli-Palestinian front is engagement with other regional powers, such as Syria and Iran, which control or heavily influence the workings of major actors in Palestinian politics. But that suggests the real problem and real power lies elsewhere, thus undermining the first argument.

So what is lost in all this copy is that both views cannot be held coherently at the same time.

Byron Calame, New York Times public editor, in "Scoops, Impact or Glory: What Motivates Reporters?" (Dec. 3), sought to answer his headline's question. Journalists are motivated by a range of goals, he writes, among them the desire "to get on the front page"; to win prizes; and to tell compelling stories that affect readers' emotions. Topping the list, however, was "being first with new facts or fresh insights."

When the need to churn out copy quickly for the nonstop 24-hour news cycle often leads to the shallow repetition of the conventional storyline, finding a truly new insight from a journalist can be as important as it is refreshing. A recent example:

Globe and Mail reporter and columnist Doug Saunders, reporting from Istanbul on "Papal visit underlines Turkish take on faith" (November 30), noted that while only nine per cent of Turks support making sharia law the law of the land, and only 25 per cent support the idea that Turkish political parties should be based on Islam, almost half say they consider themselves Muslim first and Turkish second.

However, Saunders contributes a more original take – that these more religious Turks mostly confine their devotions to their private lives. As Saunders writes, while these Muslim Turks "are more faithful and devoted to Islam than ever before, they are less willing to let it become part of their public or political life."

Many analysts have argued that, unlike contemporary Christianity and Judaism, Islam remains predominantly a "political religion." Yet in Turkey, paradoxically, a society made up almost entirely of Muslims, those who espouse religion reveal a development that's rare in the rest of the Islamic world.

"Turkey has begun to practice Islam the way Europe practices its religion, as a largely private matter, removed from overt politics," Saunders writes, following an interview with Bosporus University Professor Binnaz Toprak, who has been studying Turkish attitudes toward religion and politics and is one of the authors of a recent major report on popular attitudes.

In drawing attention to the importance of these findings – and the paradox of Turkish society – Saunders points to a possible liberal tendency that could be emulated by other Muslim countries.

Coast to Coast

'We do not see Jewish law validating homosexual lifestyle'

homosexuality is an orientation one cannot control.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, who voted for the traditional papers, said that one of the opinions expressed in Levy's paper said that " a sense of being locked in [by homosexuality] is true of most of the gay community, but not all of the gay community, and those people who are not locked in should seek… the kind of therapy that would help them, to place themselves in a heterosexual relationship."

Rabbis Roth and Levy, along with rabbis Mayer Rabinowitz and Joseph Prouser, resigned from the law committee to protest its endorsement of the liberal Dorff paper.

Momentum has been building for years for a more permissive Conservative attitude toward homosexuality in the United States, despite the committee's 1992 decision upholding the ban on gay rabbis and commitment ceremonies.

But Conservative rabbis in Toronto and Montreal do not expect that the attitude on this side of the border will change – at least not for now.

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's Rabbi Howard Morrison said that if you were to poll 10 rabbis in Manhattan, you might get an array of opinions, but in Toronto, there would most likely be a consensus on a more traditional view.

"I believe that if not every Conservative rabbi in the Toronto area, a great majority on this particular issue is like-minded. We're very welcoming and compassionate to any and every Jew regardless of what they bring or don't bring, but we do not see Jewish law as validating a homosexual lifestyle, let alone officiation of any sort at a commitment of a relationship," Rabbi Morrison said.

Rabbi Wayne Allen at Beth Tikvah Synagogue said that despite the liberal paper's lenience that allows the possibility for rabbinical seminaries to accept gay students and for rabbis to perform commitment ceremonies, none of the rulings overturned the Torah's prohibition on male homosexual activity.

"[The liberal paper] does however, stand in diametric opposition to the entire train of rabbinic thought and for those who hold fast to Jewish law, no doubt this would be embarrassing," Rabbi Allen said.

Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation said he strongly opposed the Dorff, Nevins and Reisner paper.

"I repudiate the liberal decision and find that it is not an halachic decision at all. It is in fact a social, political, dogmatic, philosophic statement, but it does not come up to halachic standards of any sort," Rabbi Salztman said.

Paul Kochberg, the president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's Canadian region, said that although he wasn't surprised that the law committee accepted a more liberal view on homosexuality, people shouldn't expect any radical changes at their shuls.

"We have to remember that these decisions are not mandatory, they're advisory. No one has to follow anything," Kochberg said.

Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, who is a voting member of the law committee, voted for Rabbi Roth's paper, which upheld the status quo, banning homosexuality. He agreed with Kochberg.

"In the short-term, I don't think anything will happen. I can't see anything changing other than an attitudinal change."

He said that within a day after returning from New York, he received three e-mails from congregants about what these rulings could mean here.

"The e-mails were from people who want to see change, who found the outcome interesting."

But Rabbi Saltzman said that the liberal rulings might cause a rift between American and Canadian conservatives.

"I think that it will sharpen our resolve to want to determine our destiny and to establish our own institutions of Canadian Conservative Judaism so that we can define our own religious message and not be told that we are two generations behind the Americans," he said.

Montreal Shaare Zion Congregation's Rabbi Lionel Moses, who believes that the liberal ruling "unquestionably" defies Jewish law, said that the only major changes he thinks he and his colleagues will face is the way they will respond to gay couples.

"When the movement did not permit commitment ceremonies, rabbis had the unanimity of the movement to say that it is not permitted and being part of the movement, whatever my personal opinion is, is irrelevant. Now, my personal opinion needs to come to the fore, and this is a very sensitive issue because gay and lesbian members of the community make contributions to the community whether they are out in the open or whether they remain private and quiet," said Rabbi Moses, who served on the law committee for about 15 years until 2000.

Rabbi Allen doesn't expect much of a change in the way Toronto-area rabbis run their shuls.

"Here, the rabbis of the Conservative movement, with whom I serve in Canada, have a general consensus and that consensus is that we are content with the traditional reading of Jewish law and we are not compelled at this point to participate in commitment ceremonies of any sort," he said.

"In my mind, the real issue that should have been on the table was how to show compassion to human beings with homosexual tendencies and not how to find some kind of strategy that would validate homosexual lifestyle."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that regardless of whether one favoured the traditional or liberal papers, the priority should be making gay and lesbian Jews feel welcome, not changing Halachah.

"Some of us feel very strongly in outreach to people, making them feel comfortable, creating a space, including them, but not changing Halachah," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

"Everyone around the table is sympathetic to working to be more inclusive. There is no homophobia. There is no one who is not sensitive to the issue," said Rabbi Scheim.

Mitzvah Day draws 300

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ottawa's Soloway Jewish Community Centre was a hub of activity on Dec. 3 as more than 300 people gathered to individually and collectively help the less fortunate in their community.

"No one [person] can change the world, but all of us can make a small difference with the people who are around us," said Leonard Stern, who, along with his children, took part in the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's second annual Mitzvah Day.

Event chair Evan Zelikovitz and his committee spent nearly a year planning the day, which, he said, exceeded all expectations. "I can't remember the last time I was at a community event where so many families were doing things together… it was a real feel-good day," he said.

The activities began a few days earlier when a group of Grade 6 students from Charles H. Hulse Public School and Hillel Academy Hebrew Day School joined forces to sew traditional challah covers. The covers were included in Sabbath kits to be distributed by Shalom Bayit, a Jewish Family Services program that helps women in abusive relationships find safety.

The activities on Mitzvah Day itself began with a free kickoff breakfast at the JCC, where participants were provided with maps of the JCC building indicating the various mitzvah stations they could choose.

At Mitzvah Day "home base," there was information about Canadian Blood Services and a bone marrow donor registry, as well as a place to donate to the kosher and other food banks, and an opportunity to pick a "leaf" from a "Mitzvah Bush" to provide someone with a much-needed item.

Celebrities were on hand in the event's Painting Palace to paint ceramic tiles that will be part of a permanent wall display along a corridor between Hillel Lodge, a long-term care facility for seniors, and the JCC.

CBC Radio afternoon show host Adrian Harewood spent most of the morning painting both a tile and a spice holder.

"I think it's a great community event and it allows people who might not normally meet to have an opportunity to meet and exchange," he said.

By coincidence, one of the young people painting with him, Noa Nussbaum, had been interviewed by him recently when she was in a Remembrance Day play at her school.

She and her sisters enjoyed painting and getting to know Harewood in person.

Team Radio host "Stuntman Stu" – aka Stuart Adam Schwartz – came to Mitzvah Day with his son, Matteo. "It's an honour to be a part of it," he said. "Otherwise, I would have had Jewish guilt! I was brought up on this, so it's natural to pass it along."

Volunteers, including groups from Beth Shalom Synagogue and Temple Israel, packed lunch kits with non-perishable food to distribute to the homeless.

Zelikovitz said he thinks the event could be a model for a much larger one that extends beyond the Jewish community. "I can see 15,000 people across the city getting together," he said.

Israel is still strong, says Barak

By KATHARINE HAMER
Jewish Independent

VANCOUVER — Although it recently faced one of the more challenging times in its short history, Israel has lost none of its staying power, one of its former prime ministers says.

If anything, said Ehud Barak, who led the country from 1999 to 2001, there's "a ray of light, even with the bad news. It is the vibrancy of our society and the resilience of our economy."

He said part of the reason that Israel remains unbowed is "our real secret weapon… the solidarity with Jews within the mishpachah [family] all around the world."

Barak was speaking Dec. 3 to a capacity crowd at Congregation Schara Tzedeck, at a fundraiser organized by Hillel Vancouver. In his wide-ranging speech, he reflected on how Israel might have better handled this summer's conflict with Hamas and Hezbollah, and he expounded upon Middle Eastern affairs and expressed his deep fondness for Hillel, an organization he first joined more than 30 years ago while a graduate student at Stanford University.

That school's Hillel House, he said, took care of his wife and infant daughter when he returned to Israel to fight in the Yom Kippur War. He encouraged the audience to contribute to Hillel Vancouver's capital campaign to raise more than $5 million to build new facilities at the University of British Columbia.

Some two dozen protesters from the Canada Palestine Association, the Palestine Community Centre and Jews for a Just Peace stood outside Schara Tzedeck, holding candles and placards calling Barak a war criminal. Hillel students waving Israeli flags also gathered outside the synagogue.

"If Mr. Barak and others had lived up to the stipulations of the Oslo agreements, we would be in a very different place than we are today," said Stephen Aberle of Jews for a Just Peace.

"During the Oslo peace process… settlement construction in the occupied territories was supposed to end and withdrawal from various autonomous Palestinian areas was supposed to be accomplished, and instead we saw an acceleration of settlement construction, and we also saw devastating military incursions against the Palestinian population … [and] targeted killings of Palestinians, along with whom innocent civilians who happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time were killed.

"I count all of those as war crimes, and [Barak] was in charge."

In remarks to reporters, Barak strongly refuted the protesters' war crimes allegations.

"I respect their right to protest," he said, "and we [are better off] living in places where people can protest against visiting speakers… Maybe these guys are not aware of it, but at Camp David 6½ years ago, I put together, with [then-U.S. president Bill] Clinton, for the first time in the history of the conflict, an offer on the table, by which in exchange for an end to the conflict and certain considerations for Israeli security and our affiliation to our birthplace, the Palestinians could get a Palestinian, independent state, contiguous over 100 per cent of the Gaza Strip and 90-plus per cent of the West Bank – with right of return into the Palestinian state, of course, not into Israel – and even certain Arab, heavily populated neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem as part of their Palestinian capital.

"And [then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser] Arafat, on behalf of the Palestinian people, was unready to accept this offer, even as a basis for negotiations and deliberately and consciously turned to terror. That's why whenever anyone – an Arab leader, spokesman or protester – tells me it's all about occupation, occupation, occupation, I tell them, no, it's about terror."

He continued: "If it were about occupation, we could have already put it behind us years ago and could be well into the implementation of a peace agreement. Unfortunately, what I've found is that Mr. Arafat was not about correcting '67… but '47 and the very establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. I can tell you very bluntly: we will never, ever, yield to terror, period. Yielding to terrorists is like feeding crocodiles: they just want more."

In his speech, Barak, a former chief of staff, criticized how the Israeli government handled this past summer's military campaign.

He said the Israel Defence Forces is still one of the world's best fighting forces, "but like any other force, it should be prepared.

He added: "After five years of policing the West Bank and Gaza, an army should have a certain period, probably several days or several weeks… before it jumps into such a war… But once we decide to go to war – and no war in our history was more justifiable than this one – we have to make sure that it will be decided in an unquestionable way – immediately, with minimal suffering to the home front and in a way that we cause the other side to lose its appetite for wars for years to come. Somehow, we did not come to grips with these basic principles during this last campaign."

Speaking to reporters, Barak also defended his decision to withdraw Israeli forces from southern Lebanon in 2000, following 18 years of occupation, saying the decision helped Israel fight Hezbollah this past summer.

He said he would do the same thing today.

"It is only because I ordered the pullout from Lebanon to the last square inch [that] Israel could have fought [Hezbollah], responded in this way, and occupied the moral high ground in the world, and [received] the support of the UN Security Council and the G-8 or even the support of certain Arabs," he said.

"What [has] happen[ed] since [the withdrawal] only convinced me even stronger that we had to pull out. In fact, we put an end to a tragedy that was there for 18 years and cost the life of thousands of Israelis, many Lebanese, with no real profound reason, because this security zone that we had for the last 15 years could never block Katyushas from coming to Israel," he added.

Edmonton man fined for Internet hate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Edmonton man has been fined $5,000 for operating a website that promoted hatred and contempt of Jews, homosexuals and native people.

In a decision released last week, the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) ordered Glenn Bahr and the website he controlled, Western Canada For Us (WCFU), to stop using the Internet to communicate material that exposes identifiable groups to hate. It ordered the WCFU to pay $5,000 as well.

"Mr. Bahr repeatedly communicated or caused to be communicated messages regarding Jewish people, homosexuals, the mentally disabled, blacks and other non-whites that were vicious and extreme in their characterization. The materials communicated expressed hatred and contempt," the judgement stated.

"Some of the material considered in these reasons advocates for the extermination of Jewish people, homosexuals and persons suffering mental disabilities. This weighs heavily in favour of the assessment of a significant penalty."

The ruling by CHRC member Julie Lloyd came in response to a complaint by Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman, who has launched several other actions against Internet sites and their operators. Warman alleged that in 2004, Bahr and WCFU communicated hate messages through the WCFU website and by making available for download several white supremacist tracts, including The International Jew by Henry Ford and The Turner Diaries.

The commission accepted evidence that postings to the website under the pseudonym SS-88 – which referred to the Nazi security service and the phrase Heil Hitler – originated with Bahr. It rejected the contention by his representative, former school teacher Paul Fromm, that an unknown person hacked the website and posted the material in question.

Bahr is also facing Criminal Code charges for promoting hatred of an identifiable group.

YU rep was six before learning he was Jewish

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Mo Lidksy was barely a teenager, he had no idea that years later he would be a graduate of Yeshiva University in New York and national director of Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University.

In fact, Lidsky didn't even know he was Jewish until he was six years old.

But today, the Ukrainian-born 23-year-old is very aware of what it means to be a Jew, and he wants other youths to have the same opportunity to connect with their faith the way he did.

In his new position, Lidsky, who moved to Toronto to be with his wife, hopes to start such programs as a series of shiurim led by YU scholars at participating shuls; a young leaders cabinet, which would help young professionals become community leaders; and a beit midrash where modern Orthodox Jews can learn together.

Lidsky's resume as a community leader is impressive. As a high school senior, he was president of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) and travelled around the United States promoting the organization.

In his second year of university, he and a friend started a non-profit organization called The Helping Jew, whose annual revenues of more than $500,000, go to helping send kids from the former Soviet Union to Hebrew day school.

Despite Lidsky's experience working in the Jewish community, when the vice-president of YU called him a day before he was set to move to Toronto to offer him his new position, he was reluctant to take it. "I never expected to actually work for the community. I thought it would be something that I do in my free time. It's something I have always done, but never did I expect to collect a paycheque from it," he said.

But the most interesting thing about his appointment is not his young age, but the fact that only 10 years ago, the only connection he had to Judaism was that he resented his Jewish roots.

Mo Lidsky

Until he was 10 years old, Lidsky and his family lived in Ukraine, before moving to Austria, then to Italy, and then finally settling in Cleveland, Ohio.

It wasn't until his first day of school in Ukraine that he heard of "Jewish." Lidsky recalled coming into class and looking for his "mini-passport," a card for each student that included information such as name, address and birthday.

"At the bottom of all the cards, it had your nationality. Everyone else's card said 'Russian,' and I was the only kid in the class that said 'Jewish,'" he said. "I had never heard about Jewish before. I thought, 'What the heck does this mean?'"

When he came home, he confronted his mother about being Jewish, but she didn't want to discuss it.

"My mother, for the life of her, tried to hide my Judaism from me as a security precaution. She didn't want me to flaunt it," Lidsky said, adding that while anti-Semitism in Ukraine wasn't overt, it was part of society.

It wasn't until he was invited to a Christmas party by Christian missionaries in Italy that his mother explained to him that he was Jewish and couldn't celebrate holidays such as Christmas.

Although disappointed, he didn't give it another thought until his family arrived in Cleveland and his mother wanted to enrol him in a Jewish Sunday school.

Its principal had an unofficial policy that if an immigrant kid came from the former Soviet Union and got circumcised, that year's tuition would be free.

"I was a Russian kid who had never heard of circumcision," Lidsky, said adding that in Ukraine, no one, non-Jews and Jews alike, got circumcised. "To me, it was like clipping off your nose. It was the most foreign concept. I fought her to the death."

But his mother insisted, and Lidsky agreed to get circumcised as long as his father and little brother did, too.

Lidsky underwent an even bigger transformation while in Grade 9 at an inner city high school in Cleveland.

"For some odd reason or another, it always bothered me that so many of my friends would walk around proudly wearing massive crosses… I just thought they were so proud of who they were and I had nothing to show for who I was."

After trying unsuccessfully to find a place to buy a Magen David to wear around his neck, he found a colourful kippah lying around the house.

"I don't know why in the world I put it on. It was nothing religious, I just wanted to show that I was proud."

At first, he said, everyone at school accepted it, but within weeks, people started avoiding him. He was no longer invited to parties, his Catholic girlfriend broke up with him, he lost touch with friends, and he started getting into fights.

One day, mail arrived from the local Jewish federation about an anti-Semitism-themed essay contest. He entered and was one of 25 people who won $2,500 to take part in a summer program in Israel. It would change his life forever.

The NCSY program Jerusalem Journey taught him the significance of Jewish practices such as Shabbat and kashrut, and while in Israel, Lidsky happened to meet YU's dean, who told him about the school. When his Israel trip ended, Lidsky decided to move to New York and attend Yeshiva University High School for Boys.

At 14, he hopped on a Greyhound bus to New York and cabbed to the high school a week before the start of classes – without having applied, without having been accepted, without money for tuition, and without a place to go.

Nonetheless, the school "welcomed me with open arms," he said, adding that scholarships allowed him to graduate three years later.

Lidsky ultimately decided that his new position would be the best way to give back to a school that helped give his life meaning.

"If I can get the university connected more with the community, whether through outreach, or continuing education for professionals, or to develop community leaders, if I could just do that… there is nothing better I can do."

Chanukah Food Ideas

Latkes don't have to start with potatoes

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

I'm bored. Maybe it's the 30-year itch, but I've been making the same Chanukah potato latkes for decades. (Not that there's anything wrong with them. Several years ago, in reviewing my cookbook Melting Pot Memories, Food Editor Cathy Thomas of the Orange County Register called them "crispy-brown snowflakes" and "lacy, almost-crunchy wonders" – but I don't like to brag.) Now I'm itching for something new.

A formal setting as seen in kosher by design Entertains by Susie Fishbein, Mesorah Publications Ltd.

Like the song about love, I seem to be lookin' for latkes in all the wrong places, because lately, daring latke diversions have been popping up where I least expect them, and I'm like Alice in Latke-land. They all seem to say, "Fry me!" Others respond, "No, me!"

For Chanukah, it's all about the oil. When Judah Maccabee and his tiny army defeated the Syrian-Greeks, they found only a tiny flask of oil with which to purify the desecrated Temple. Miraculously, it burned for eight days, setting off a frying frenzy that has lasted for centuries.

But who says traditional potato latkes are the only fritter fit to fry? My latkes this year come from unusual sources. (No Jewish cookbooks were injured in the writing of this story.)

Latkes from a novel? In Sharon Boorstin's irresistible romp, Cookin' For Love (chick-lit for the 49-year-old-plus set – with recipes, of course), Miriam, a married Jewish cookbook author, fantasizes about food while her divorced friend, Kate, fantasizes about an old flame. When Kate Googles her former lover (married yet!) and he invites her for a rendezvous in Muslim Malaysia, she begs Miriam to come along.

Miriam's thoughts seldom stray from food – a bikini wax reminds her of Grandma Estelle plucking a chicken – and when she awakens from a dream about Grandma's latkes to find her cleaver-toting captor frying curried onions, it's an "aha" moment of the kitchen kind. Cashews! Ginger! This is a latke with pizzazz!

Next, Chanukah shopping for my grandchildren, I stumble on Joanne Rocklin's The Very Best Hanukkah Gift, chosen by the Sydney Taylor Book Award Committee of the Association of Jewish Libraries as one of the best Chanukah books of the past few years. (Go to www.jewishlibraries.org to see the whole list of 27.)

In the story, eight-year-old Daniel, an awkward middle child, eagerly awaits Chanukah – eight nights of candlelighting, games and gifts, not to mention the wonderful food. But while Daniel revels in the story of the brave Maccabees, he has to face his own dog phobia before his sister's dream of a puppy for Chanukah can come true. To top it off, his mom is making green latkes! Gross! Daniel faces both challenges, and I've got another recipe. Made with zucchini – the holiday is not about the potato, but the oil, remember – these latkes are called "Miracle Latkes," as they use hardly any oil at all. Healthy and delicious, and I don't have to wear them. Now, that's a miracle!

And speaking of healthy, when I'm hankering for a low-fat dish with panache, the Moosewood Collective never lets me down. These 19 folks who own and operate the legendary Moosewood Restaurant in Ithaca, N.Y., helped put vegetarian dining and organic foods on the culinary map. So this mecca of healthy, natural food would hardly be the first place I'd look for latkes to fry. But, wait. Potatoes are vegetarian, and this lemon-scented sweet potato pancake makes a fine – excuse me? Dessert? Another surprise, but why not? A sweet ending to a sweet celebration.

MIRIAM'S MALAYSIAN LATKES

Adapted from Cooking For Love by Sharon Boorstin (iUniverse)

½ cup chopped cashews or peanuts
¼ cup chopped mint or flat-leaf parsley or a combination
¼ finely chopped sweet red pepper
2 tbsp. finely chopped jalapeno pepper (veins and seeds removed)
2 tsp. freshly grated ginger
1½ to 2 tsp. salt, or to taste (see note)
1 tsp. curry powder
2 large eggs
2 large baking potatoes, peeled and cut into wedges
1 medium onion, coarsely chopped
¼ cup all-purpose flour
vegetable oil for frying

Combine the nuts, mint, peppers, ginger, salt, curry powder and eggs in a large bowl. In a food processor with the shredding disk attached, shred the potatoes and onions together and drain well in several changes of ink-free paper towels. Squeeze to release as much liquid as possible. Add the potatoes and onions to the egg mixture and combine well. Stir in the flour.

Think beyond the potato

In a large, heavy skillet, heat enough oil to cover the bottom of the pan on medium-high heat. When the oil is quite hot but not smoking, add a scant 1/4 cup of batter per latke and flatten with a fork.

Fry only as many patties as will fit without crowding. Cook on one side until crisp and brown, about 2-3 minutes. Turn over and repeat. Remove the patties to paper towels to absorb excess oil. Serve with yogurt mixed with chopped cucumbers and salt and cumin seeds to taste. Makes 16 latkes.

Note: To taste the potato mixture (or any mixture containing raw eggs), microwave a teaspoon or two until cooked through, 10 seconds or so, depending on size and strength of the microwave.

MIRACLE ZUCCHINI LATKES

From The Very Best Chanukah Gift by Joanne Rocklin (Delacorte Press)

2 tbsp. vegetable oil
5 medium zucchini, unpeeled
3 green onions, white and green parts, thinly sliced
2 large eggs
2/3 to 1 cup seasoned bread crumbs
1 1/2 tsp. salt, or to taste
1/4 tsp. pepper, or to taste

Preheat the oven to 425. Coat 2 cookie sheets with 1 tbsp. of oil each. Spread with a spatula. Spray with vegetable cooking spray.

Clean the zucchini well. Grate them by hand or in batches in the food processor. Drain on several changes of ink-free paper towels for 30 minutes.

Place the grated zucchini in a bowl and mix with green onions, eggs, 2/3 cup of the bread crumbs, salt and pepper. Use your hands to form a "dough" that can stick together, adding up to 1/3 cup more bread crumbs, if necessary.

Using a soup spoon, mound the zucchini mixture on the cookie sheets into 10 equal portions. Press down with a fork to form thin pancakes. Bake until brown on the bottom, about 12 minutes. Turn the pancakes over and bake until brown on the other side, 5-8 minutes more. Makes 20 latkes.

SWEET POTATO PANCAKES WITH LEMON-MAPLE SYRUP AND WHIPPED CREAM

From Moosewood Restaurant New Classics by Moosewood Collective (Clarkson Potter)

1 cup peeled and finely grated raw sweet potatoes
1/4 to 1/2 tsp. freshly grated lemon peel
1 large egg
1 cup milk
2 tbsp. oil or melted butter
1 cup unbleached all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. sugar
1/2 cup pure maple syrup
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
freshly whipped cream

In a bowl or large measuring cup, combine sweet potatoes, lemon peel, egg, milk and oil. In a separate bowl, stir together flour, baking powder, salt and sugar. Gently stir the dry ingredients into the wet ingredients just to combine. Do not beat or overstir. Set aside to rest for 5-10 minutes.

Warm a lightly oiled skillet, griddle, or nonstick frying pan on medium-high heat. When a drop of water bounces and sizzles on the skillet and before the oil smokes, pour a scant 1/4 cup batter to form round pancakes. When pancakes are evenly dotted with bubbles and about half the bubbles have broken, about 2 minutes, flip pancakes with a spatula. Cook the second side until lightly browned, about 1 minute. Repeat until all the batter is used.

Serve right away or keep warm in a 250-degree oven. If you plan to serve at room temperature or reheat later, cook the pancakes in a single layer on a flat surface and then stack for storage. If storing for more than a few hours, refrigerate.

Combine maple syrup and lemon juice in a small bowl. Serve pancakes at room temperature drizzled with lemon-maple syrup and top with whipped cream. Serves 4.

Sibling property rights after marriage

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Question. My sister is going to marry next month. She and her husband and my sister will be living in the property which is jointly owned by my sister and I and I will be moving out. I paid over half of the value of the house when we purchased it and now I am paying the property taxes and utilities while my sister is paying the mortgage for the rest of the value. My question is: will her husband be entitled to have any interest in the property in case they are separated?

Answer: In the event of separation of your sister and her new husband, your sister's share in this home would be considered a "matrimonial home" under Ontario's Family Law Act. What this means is that one-half of its entire equity, including one-half of its pre-marital value, would be included when calculating her net worth or "net family property" as of the date of separation. Her net worth is compared to her husband's in the event of separation or if one them dies and the richer of the two must pay the poorer an "equalization payment" to "equalize" their respective net worth positions.

To give a simple example, if the only asset owned by your sister is her half-interest in a home worth $400,000 and her half-interest on the date of separation was $200,000 and her husband had no assets, then she would have to pay him $100,000 in the absence of a marriage contract (or pre-nuptial agreement). However, your one-half ownership of the home stays completely unaffected.

Question: If my sister and her husband want to prepare a pre-nuptial agreement, do they have to do it by lawyers or can that be done by witnesses?

Answer: You always need two witnesses. They can do so without lawyers but then again you can also do surgery on yourself without doctors and I don't advise that either. Use competent legal counsel. These agreements require knowledge of the law and certain skills on how to draft an enforceable agreement. Don't fool yourself. . . . .

Question: If there's no pre-nuptial agreement, do investments and RRSPs etc. before marriage have to be shared if the couple separates?

Answer: Except for a home where both parties still reside on the date of separation, the values of pre-marital assets do not form part of a spouse's net family property. In that sense pre-marital assets are not shared. However, any increase in the values of pre-marital assets after marriage are included, unless specifically excluded by a marriage contract.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Beard Winter, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Chanukah.

A time to eat greasy foods – without guilt

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

We celebrate Chanukah, the festival of light, to commemorate the tiny jar of oil that miraculously lasted for eight days in the holy Temple liberated by Judah and his Maccabees.

This holiday is a particularly delicious celebration because we get to eat greasy foods, which, according to tradition, symbolize the tiny jar of oil.

We therefore feel no guilt when we consume – it's almost a religious obligation, we tell ourselves – latkes and jelly doughnuts. Chanukah is licence to gobble up foods virtually devoid of nutritional value. We throw out the calorie-counters and forget about fat, carbs and cholesterol for eight glorious days.

We even add fat to fat. We smother our latkes in sour cream and savour each hypercaloric mouthful. Forget about "fat-free" or "low-fat." In some circles, even using calorie-reduced sour cream is considered sacrilegious.

On this holiday, the peasant of all foods, the lowly potato is elevated to the rank of main course. Jelly doughnuts, or sufganiyot, also have a place of honour at the Chanukah table, but the latke is the undisputed king of the festive meal.

And well it should be when one considers the amount of work it takes to turn potatoes into full-fledged home-made latkes. Even with food processors, it's a huge patchke. And the smell of the onions and potatoes lingers for days.

I don't know how our grandmothers managed to grate all those onions and potatoes by hand. It was a true labour of love.

More than any other food, the latke in all its greasy glory connects us to our shtetl roots. In our peasant past, the potato in all its guises – knishes, vereinikas, and kugel, to name a few traditional dishes from the Ashkenzi culinary lexicon – was often the main course. Other kinds of foods were not easily affordable.

By making latkes, we pay homage to the creative cookery and culinary devotion of our grandmothers and great-grandmothers and their mothers before them.

And while latkes are the crown jewel of the Ashkenazi Chanukah feast, the holiday is often an opportunity for adventurous cooks to prepare other greasy dishes from recipes clipped from magazines or marked in cookbooks – recipes too fattening to consider serving at any other time.

The following recipes from Susan Mendelson's latest cookbook, Mama Now Cooks Like This (Whitecap, 2006), are rich in taste and have enough calories to complement any Chanukah spread.

WILD MUSHROOM RISOTTO BALLS

3 cups vegetable broth
2 tbs. olive oil
½ cup finely chopped onions
1 cup assorted mushrooms
1 cup plus 2 tbs. arborio rice or any short grain pearly rice)
¼ cup dry white wine
6 tbsp. grated Parmesan cheese
2 tbsp. butter
salt and pepper to taste
6 oz. fotina or any hard cheese, cubed
2 eggs
1½ cups coarsely ground bread crumbs
canola oil for frying

Heat broth until it simmers and reduce to low, keeping it hot.

Heat oil in a medium saucepan. Sauté onions and mushrooms until soft about 5 minutes, add rice and stir 1 minute. Add wine and stir until it's absorbed.

Add the broth, one-third at a time and simmer until rice is just tender and risotto is creamy, allowing broth to be completely absorbed before adding more and stirring often (this will take 18 minutes). Remove rice from heat.

Add grated cheese and butter. Spread into 9 x 1-inch pan and cool completely. Shape risotto in 1-inch balls, placing a small cube of cheese in the centre of each ball. Place on small plate. Beat eggs in a shallow bowl. Dip risotto balls into the beaten egg and then into the bread crumbs to coat.

Preheat oven to 350. In a large shallow skillet, heat oil to medium high and sauté the risotto balls until they are crispy and brown. Transfer to a baking dish to keep warm in preheated oven. Makes 36 to 40 balls.

ZUCCHINI PANCAKES

5 cups zucchini, grated
1 small onion, grated
3 eggs
¼ cup of flour
1 tsp. baking powder
salt to taste
pepper to taste
canola oil for frying

Combine all the ingredients except the oil. Add oil to the frying pan to cover the bottom to ¼ inch in depth. Heat oil and drop in batter by the spoonful. Cook until golden brown on each side, about 3 minutes per side. Makes 3 to 4 servings.

You can make cholent just the way you like it

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There are at least 52 different ways to make cholent – all of them delicious.

Much as I love cholent, I consider it a winter repast. It's a great way to serve a hot meal on a cold winter Shabbat, and it can be a meal-in-one if you prefer. But many people don't consider Shabbat Shabbat without their hot cholent, winter or summer.

If you're new to making cholent, it may take some time and experimenting until you get it just the way you like it, but after that you're home free! Not only the ingredients but the amount of liquid and temperature you cook it at can vary, depending on whether you cook it in an electric crock pot, a heavy pot on your stovetop or in the oven. It can also vary depending on whether you use an electric warming tray or a stovetop blech (warming tray).

One wonderful thing about cholent is that it isn't a dish that has to be carefully measured or tended to. I always spray my cholent pot with non-stick spray before adding the ingredients. It makes for very easy cleanup. A fairly new product on the market is crockpot bags to line your cholent pot, made of a type of high-density plastic that doesn't melt. I found them at the kosher butcher shop.

If you're very fat conscious, it's possible to cook the cholent on Thursday and put it in the refrigerator overnight. All the fat will congeal on top. Just before Shabbat, skim the fat and place cholent back in crockpot or on the blech.

Almost all cholent recipes call for beans and almost every Jewish cook has his or her own recipe to "de-gas" the beans. Some cook or soak the beans for several hours beforehand. Some soak the beans in cold water overnight. Some pre-boil them for about 10 to 15 minutes and then let them stand in the water for awhile. My Aunt Evelyn soaks hers overnight with some baking soda added to the beans. Still others use a commercial product on the market to aid digestion of beans. My only suggestion is to try a couple of methods and see what works best for you.

I like to save leftover gravy from roasts and other dishes in the freezer and add it to the cholent as part of the liquid. The water or liquid level should cover all the ingredients, but don't fill the pot higher than within one or two inches from the top of the pot.

Some cooks like to layer the ingredients, others just put it all together. I really don't think it makes any difference in the taste, and cholent isn't the type of dish in which it will make a difference appearance-wise.

The number of servings shown with the recipes is very approximate. It will depend on whether you're serving the cholent as your main course or as a side dish and how many other dishes you're serving with it. There are times that I like to put a whole chuck roast in the cholent and make that the main part of the meal along with a salad.

BASIC CHOLENT

1 cup barley
1 large onion, coarsely chopped
1 cup baby lima beans
2 cloves garlic, finely chopped
⅔ cup red kidney beans
2 tbsp. oil
1½ lb. flanken, cut into large chunks
6 small potatoes
2 tsp. salt
5 or 6 beef marrow or neck bones, optional
1 tsp. black pepper

Spray cholent pot with non-stick spray. Brown meat and onion in cholent pot. Rinse barley in a sieve under cold running water, until water runs clear. Rinse beans thoroughly. Peel potatoes (optional) and cut into halves. Place all ingredients into cholent pot, add enough water or liquid to cover and bring to a boil on high heat. Cook on medium high for approximately 1 hour, turn to low and continue cooking. Makes approximately 6 servings.

Chanukah Food Ideas

Cholent – more than just beans and barley

VEGETARIAN CHOLENT

2 onions, cut into chunks
8-oz. can tomato sauce
2-3 stalks celery
6 potatoes
2 tsp. salt
4-5 carrots
1 tsp. black pepper
3 zucchini squash, cut into 3-inch chunks
1 cup barley
1 cup beans

Spray cholent pot with non-stick spray. Layer bottom of pot with onions. Add remaining vegetables, seasonings, tomato sauce and enough water or liquid to cover. Cook for approximately one hour at medium high, turn to low and continue cooking. Makes approximately 6 servings.

CHICKEN CHOLENT

1/2 to 1/4 cup white beans
1/2 cup baby lima beans
4 to 6 chicken quarters
salt and pepper to taste
garlic and paprika to taste
2 potatoes, quartered
1 sweet potato, cut into thick slices
1 onion, quartered
1 carrot, peeled and quartered
1/2 cup barley
1/4 to 1/3 cup wheat berries
3 to 5 tbsp. soy sauce
1 bay leaf

Use a 6-quart pot.

The night before you prepare this dish, put all the beans in a large bowl and cover with cold water. Allow to soak overnight. Before cooking, drain beans and discard any dried-out beans.

Season chicken with spices, salt and pepper (if desired, cumin and coriander can also be used). Place chicken on bottom of pot. Add potatoes, sweet potato, onion, carrot and drained beans. Add water to cover. Add barley and wheat berries.

Bring cholent to boil. Add soy sauce and bay leaf and simmer for at least 1 1/2 hours. Add water when necessary, making sure water is one inch above ingredients. Place on blech before Shabbat. Keep pot tightly covered.

Variation: Substitute 1 lb. veal and 1 lb. flanken for the chicken. Serves 6-8.

Visiting the elderly suffering from dementia

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Sharing stories and memories of events keeps relationships going even when a person has dementia or Alzheimer's disease, according to Ruth Goodman, a senior social worker at Baycrest.

She was speaking at the annual Ada Starkman Lecture, sponsored by Beverly Black, in honour of her late mother.

This year's program was titled "Visiting with Elders: Strategies to Help You Have a Meaningful and Rich Visit with an Elderly Loved One." The focus was on those with cognitive impairment.

Talking about past experiences honours those memories, and makes the person talking about them feel valued. For instance, Goodman said, if you are talking about a special person, or a special time, ask what the person is thinking about.

"Make a visit a collaborative experience. Recognize that when, for instance, a woman visits her elderly mother, both of them want the affirmation that they are important to each other."

Even when someone has dementia, she said, memories are an anchor, giving a sense of belonging, comfort and safety – a sense of home.

It is important, she said, to acknowledge that a person in a nursing home or home for the aged has a right to feel sadness, frustration, even anger at losing their independence, and their status as someone with a family, a job, a place in the community. They need solace, but they also need help maintaining their dignity.

> 'Recognize that when, for instance, a woman visits her elderly mother, both of them want the affirmation that they are important to each other'

Communicating with someone with dementia doesn't have to be only through conversation, Goodman said. "Tell stories about your own life, such as cooking, or what is in the newspaper. Bring pictures, animals, music. If you go for a walk and pass a fish tank, ask what they think the fish are thinking about. Mention that the leaves are rustling."

If a visit is not successful, she suggested, think about what you could do differently the next time. "You might ask a relative for suggestions."

Annabelle Turner talked about "the reality" of visiting her mother, who is cognitively impaired, at Baycrest. "Not only her reality changed," Turner said of her mother, Ida Orliffe, "but mine did, too."

Orliffe, wife of the late Toronto politician Herbert Orliffe, became politically active when she married. "She loved opera, the symphony, theatre, and travel." In her late 60s, Turner said, there began to be imperceptible changes, until she was finally diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease.

At first, Turner said, she would try to force her mother to remember things. But the effort, usually unsuccessful, "exhausted her, me and my family." Now, Turner's visits are shorter, and she makes sure she has planned something to do after she sees her. "I need space to recover before I go home."

One of her innovations she is very happy about is a visitors' book. The family tells Orliffe who has come to see her, and something about them. "She knows who she loves, although she may forget people's names or facts about their families. Then she is upset that she doesn't remember."

Like many people with dementias, Orliffe asks endless, and repetitive, questions. Turner realized, she said, that she had to give simple, and repeated, answers.

She does simple, comfortable things with her mother such as watering plants, tidying her room, walking in the hall or on Bathurst Street or having coffee in the garden.

Everyone has to handle these visits in their own way, Turner stressed. "When I go to see my mother, I shut out my own world and enter hers."

Stephen Bloom's mother, Lillian, is also a resident of Baycrest. He said that he has rules for when he visits her.

First, he said, he accepts that he visits her for himself, not so much for her sake, since she often forgets he has been there at all. "She is my connection with my past and my present." Most of all, he said, he appreciates "that I still have one more day with her."

He acknowledges her anger and her emotion as legitimate. That, he said, is because he has respect for her, even when he can no longer have a real conversation with her, or she repeats things over and over. "We discuss gardening – we never had time to do that when I was younger."

Bloom lamented that people who see her now don't see her as she was – intelligent, a great cook and hostess, a great reader, someone who always dressed impeccably and always wore makeup.

"I am living a reversal of roles," Bloom said with a sob. "I have to feed her breakfast, and remind her to chew her food. But she is still my mother, and I speak to her with respect."

Israel, U.S. contemplate ISG recommendations

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — Officials of the American and Israeli governments agree on two things: Iraq has nothing at all to do with Israeli-Arab issues.

Except when it does.

From U.S. President George W. Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on down, the leaderships of the Israeli and American governments are simultaneously embracing and rebuffing last week's conclusions of the congressionally mandated Iraq Study Group (ISG), which makes Israeli-Arab peace progress a linchpin of a successful outcome in Iraq.

The crux of their argument is that while it is wrong to blame the Israeli-Arab impasse for any part of the crisis in Iraq, actors in that crisis – chief among them Iran and its allies – are successfully using Israel as a justification for raising the stakes in Iraq.

"We do this not because we are persuaded by some linkage or another, but because it is in the U.S. national interest," David Welch, the top U.S. State Department envoy to the Middle East, said Friday of U.S. involvement in Arab-Israeli peace when he addressed the Saban Forum, an annual colloquy of U.S. and Israeli leaders.

Another Bush administration official put it more bluntly: "'Palestine' is not a relevant issue to Iraq, but it is an issue exploited by Iran and extremists throughout the region," the official told JTA, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Arab-Israeli peace talks would have a "positive, emboldening effect," the official said. "If progress among Israel and the Palestinians is manifested, then moderates throughout the region win and extremists lose."

Conversely, the official said, "We believe that a success in Iraq, a success for moderates against forces of extremism, whether secular or religious, will have a very significant impact in the region, in Syria, in Lebanon, as well as in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

The Bush administration has welcomed Olmert's recent overture to the Palestinians in which he promised a release of prisoners and increased mobility should a cease-fire hold and the Palestinians prove themselves able to present a negotiating team that renounces terrorism and recognizes Israel's existence.

Mahmoud Abbas, the relatively moderate Palestinian Authority president, has all but given up on such concessions from the cabinet, led by the terrorist Hamas group, and has proposed new elections.

Tzipi Livni, Israel's foreign minister, said at the Saban Forum that Israel and the West should encourage alternatives to the Hamas government, although she did not elaborate.

Bush launched a weeklong review of the Iraq Study Group's recommendations on Monday, starting with meetings with top State Department officials. Later in the week he met with outside experts, top U.S. diplomats in the region and top military brass.

His primary concern about the report is its deadline for a withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the first quarter of 2008. Bush has steadfastly resisted timetables until now.

But after meeting with Tony Blair, the British prime minister who is about to tour the region, Bush suggested that he embraced its Iraq-Israeli-Palestinian linkage, counting it as one of three ways to move the Iraq process forward.

"The Palestinian-Israeli conflict is important to be solved," the president said.

That's music to the ears of Blair and other Europeans, who enthusiastically welcomed the recommendations of the commission, headed by James Baker, secretary of state to Bush's father, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana.

"The German government shares many of the political observations in the report," a statement from the German Embassy in Washington said last week on the eve of a visit here by the German foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier. "The entire Middle East region must move into the international community's scope. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is of central importance."

Israeli-Arab peace process linchpin of successful outcome in Iraq

Such views were hardly welcome at the Saban Forum, where the ISG's report lent an anxious irritability to the weekend proceedings at Washington's Ritz Carlton hotel. The Saban Center, a Brookings Institution subsidiary funded by American-Israeli entertainment mogul Haim Saban, attracts top names to its annual colloquies. Last year's was in Jerusalem.

"The Iraqi conflict has very little to do with the Israeli-Palestinian crisis," Yuli Tamir, Israel's education minister, told JTA during a break from the conference's closed sessions. "I don't think it's relevant – it's a good justification but not a reason."

On Sunday, Olmert, who had earlier suggested that he disagrees with the report's conclusions, ordered his cabinet not to comment on it, saying it was an internal American affair.

Livni did not mention the Baker-Hamilton report by name, but its conclusions were clearly the focus of her keynote address at a gala State Department dinner last Friday night.

"There is a commonly mistaken assumption that I sometimes hear that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the core of the trouble of the Middle East, that somehow if this conflict could be resolved, so the situation could be different, and we can face a totally different region," she said. "So, this is wrong. This view confuses symptom and cause. The truth is that the conflicts in the Middle East are a consequence, not a cause, of radicalism and terrorism."

That may be the case, but Livni in the same speech was nonetheless preoccupied by how Iran would fare in the Iraq crisis – and what a success by its Shiite Muslim protégés in Iraq would bode for Israel and the region.

"The idea of spreading Shiism all over the region is a threat not only to Israel but the region itself," she said, citing efforts this week by the Hezbollah terrorist group to topple Lebanon's western-leaning government.

Bush expressed wariness about the commission's recommendations to engage Iran and Syria. He was adamant that those countries were out of bounds until they stopped backing terrorists.

If Syria and Iran are "not committed to that concept, then they shouldn't bother to show up" to a regional conference on Iraq, he said after meeting with Blair.

Iran's ambitions dominated much of the Saban Forum. Shimon Peres, the deputy prime minister, spoke darkly of the possibility of war in a Saturday-night panel with former President Bill Clinton.

"Iran's strength derives from the weakness of the international community," he said. "If there was an international coalition, there would be no need to go to war against Iran, and Iran would return to its natural dimensions."

Israel backs U.S. and European efforts to sanction Iran until it gives up enriching uranium, a step toward manufacturing a nuclear weapon.

Peres described a range of options to prevent Iran's nuclearization: monitoring its missiles with nuclear warhead capability, economic sanctions, limiting its oil production and assisting regime change.

Canadian completes Israeli astronaut's mission

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Given the hazardous nature of astronauts' work, NASA has implemented a policy that requires each one to pair off with another, with the understanding that if anything should go tragically wrong, the surviving astronaut will look after his or her friend's family.

For Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, Canadian Steve MacLean was that person, the chosen "caretaker" of his household. So it was no surprise that when Rona Ramon got a miniature Torah much like the one her late husband had with him on the ill-fated Columbia shuttle that burned up on re-entry in 2003, she turned to MacLean to complete the mission.

MacLean and Ramon became best friends through their training, and their families were close as well. MacLean was there for Rona and her family when the Columbia was destroyed, killing all on board, including Ilan. MacLean readily accepted her request that he take with him a second miniature Torah scroll, about four or five inches tall, on board the shuttle Atlantis in September.

For MacLean, a native of Ottawa who now resides in Montreal, it was like closing the circle, finishing the task Ilan had undertaken.

For Rona, there was also a life-affirming aspect to the Atlantis mission.

For Henry Fenichel, a Cincinatti physicist who provided the Torah taken by MacLean on the Atlantis, so many coincidences came together that he admitted turning to the spiritual world to help explain how he, a survivor of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, could help fulfil Ilan Ramon's dream.

The story of the space Torahs goes back a few years to the selection of Ramon as part of the international contingent of astronauts being groomed to fly on NASA's shuttles.

The son of Holocaust survivors, Ramon was an accomplished air force pilot who took part in the successful 1981 Israeli raid on Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor.

As a representative of the Jewish state, Ilan "was very careful even in his request to take [the Torah]," Rona said. "He realized it was a unique piece of history. For him, it was symbolic to overcome this horrible past as a nation and to have the Torah as a representative of an independent country, having survived and taking it to the next step, to take it to space."

MacLean, a physicist by training who was a mission specialist on the Atlantis, knew about the first Torah scroll. "He told me the story of the Torah, that he was flying with it, and it was pretty important that it go up and come back alright."

The Torah taken by Ramon was particularly significant to him. It had been smuggled into Bergen-Belsen by a rabbi from Amsterdam and was used in the secret bar mitzvah lessons of 13-year-old Joachim Joseph. Joseph studied with the rabbi at 5 a.m. each morning, and he celebrated his bar mitzvah secretly in his barrack, Fenichel said.

Thinking the young man had a better chance of survival than he, the rabbi left the Torah with Joseph. Joseph did survive the camp and moved to Israel where he became an astrophysicist at Tel Aviv University.

MacLean had close ties to Ramon

Fenichel was in a barrack nearby but knew nothing of Joseph. He was only six at the time. His father had already been shipped off to Auschwitz, where he was killed. Fenichel and his mother survived the camp as part of a population swap – 222 Dutch Jews in exchange for German settlers living in Palestine. He spent 10 days on a special train traversing Europe on a route that paralleled that of the Orient Express, sleeping in the car's luggage rack. When they crossed the Bosporus at Istanbul, a ferry carrying the Germans passed the other way.

After a few years in Palestine and then Israel, the family moved to the United States. Fenichel became a physicist and settled in Cincinnati.

At first, he didn't want to talk about his experiences, but as he got older, he agreed to serve as a living witness to the Holocaust. One day, he attended a video conference with about 150 Cincinnati school children that coincidentally included Joseph and Rona Ramon at the Israeli end. As part of his presentation, Fenichel took out his own miniature Torah, which had been given to him by cousins who had escaped the Nazis, along with the yellow star he wore in the camp.

"That really moved Rona – the parallel to the story with Joachim Joseph," he said.

Rona asked him if he would give the Torah to MacLean to take with him on the Atlantis and Fenichel agreed.

Fenichel saw it as a "symbol of the continuity of the story [that would] bring closure to a chapter of her life."

The more he thought about the situation, the more he saw uncanny parallels and a spiritual connection between the principal characters.

First was the fact that he and the Joseph were interned in the same concentration camp at the same time and survived, Joseph taking with him the Torah.

Then, there was the luck he had in receiving as a gift an almost identical miniature Torah from his relatives.

Years later, he, Joseph and Rona participated in the same video conference, when all this came together.

And finally, there were MacLean's close ties to Ramon, the fact he was about to embark on his second mission on the Atlantis and understood the significance of the Torah scroll to his old friend.

"It's almost as if the little Torah and my background have a certain mission," Fenichel said. "You have three physicists involved in a spiritual enterprise. I feel I'm being guided at this point of my career."

When Rona asked him to carry the second scroll, MacLean said, "It was important for me to do so. It was very important to Ilan. He was not a very religious individual, but those symbols were very important to him… When it came back, I felt I completed something he intended to do. It was a good feeling of completion. It was quite satisfying."

"For me, it was overcoming a very hard time in our personal lives," said Rona. "Overcoming crises, overcoming hard times and to look to the future with hope.

"There will never be closure," she continued. "I was hoping to see [more missions]. When NASA went back to flying, it's 'life goes on.'

"The Torah is a symbol of life – that the circle of life goes on, that we will overcome obstacles."

Space Torah to go on the road

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Rona Ramon, the widow of the late Columbia astronaut Ilan Ramon, first met Holocaust survivor Henry Fenichel on TV thanks to a video conference that linked Israel with Cincinnati.

The midwestern American city is home to the Center for Holocaust and Humanity Education, which operates a number of programs designed to instruct young people about the horrors of the Shoah.

One is the Reach for the Stars project, which invites young people celebrating a bar or bat mitzvah to learn about Joachim Joseph's coming of age in Bergen-Belsen. Joseph, who resides in Israel, participates in the video conference, and one special day, he was joined by Rona Ramon in Israel and Fenichel in Cincinatti.

That happy coincidence led to the request by Ramon to borrow Fenichel's mini-Torah so that it could be taken to space by astronaut Steve MacLean to complete Ilan's mission.

Last week in Cincinnati, a ceremony was held in which MacLean returned the Torah to Ramon, who passed it to Fenichel, who then symbolically turned it over to the children. It will be housed on display in the centre, said Racelle Weiman, founding director of the educational facility.

Toronto human rights advocate and Holocaust educator Karen Mock was MC at the event.

In February, the miniature Torah will be sent to Tel Aviv, where a memorial service will be held for the doomed shuttle Columbia. After that, it will be available to travel to Holocaust education centres where its story can be told and it can serve "as a dialogue between space and faith," Weiman said.

"It's not a Jewish story," she said. "It's a story about all humanity."

TEMPESTUOUS YIDDISH POET ANNA MARGOLIN WAS "DRUNK FROM THE BITTER TRUTH"

Russian-born American Yiddish poet Anna Margolin (1887-1952), who published a volume of poetry in New York in 1929, has been largely forgotten – until recently, that is. Thanks to the efforts of Toronto Yiddishist Shirley Kumove, State University of New York has published a collection of her poems – Drunk from the Bitter Truth: The Poems of Anna Margolin.

Margolin wrote on themes of anxiety, loneliness, sexual tensions and the search for intellectual and spiritual identity: the book presents her poems in the original Yiddish as well as in English translation. As translator and editor, Kumove also offers a brief critical biography of the poet. Margolin is described as an "exceptionally beautiful and gifted woman… [who] adopted a bohemian and an eccentric lifestyle, and threw herself into both intellectual pursuits and romantic attachments beyond her two marriages."

The title comes from the following stanza: "The dark and the heavy – I take them./ Come strike and wound, wild anguish./ Drunk from the bitter truth,/ I refuse all other wine."

Names in the News: The Making of a Martyr, the award-winning documentary by former Torontonian Brooke Goldstein, was screened last week at film festivals in London, England; Whistler, B.C., and Anchorage, Ala. It also aired on the American ShalomTV network in the Pennsylvania and Delaware region.

Goldstein, who works as a lawyer in New York, has received increasing media attention for the film, which Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz has called "brilliant." It focuses on the practice by Palestinian militant groups (with the complicity of the Palestinian Authority) of indoctrinating children to become suicide bombers. Its thesis is that the children's human rights are being grossly violated.

Goldstein recently told the New York Jewish Week that the film sprang out of a discussion she had in Toronto with her father about how to construct a legal case against Palestinian suicide bombers, and she realized the matter had to be considered from the Palestinian child's perspective.

Soon thereafter she interviewed Hussam Abdu, a 15-year-old would-be suicide bomber in a West Bank prison. The film showed that Abdu was just a product of the educational system because Palestinian schools routinely promote jihad and martyrdom to their young charges. Goldstein knocks critics who complain her film is pro-Israeli. "If anything, it's pro-Palestinian," she said. "I'm defending the rights of their children."

Quotable Quote: Some reviewers have taken issue with former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's biased take on Middle Eastern politics as evidenced by his new book, Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid. Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, for one, has called Carter's comparison between Israel and apartheid South Africa "outrageous" and his book "shallow and superficial."

In a Nov. 22 review, Dershowitz said the book "is so filled with simple mistakes of fact and deliberate omissions that were it a brief filed in a court of law, it would be struck and its author sanctioned for misleading the court. Mr. Carter, too, is guilty of misleading the court of public opinion. A mere listing of all of Mr. Carter's mistakes and omissions would fill a volume the size of his book."

African-American Democratic Congressman John Conyers concurs that Carter's book is neither fair nor truthful. The use of the word apartheid in the book's title "does not serve the cause of peace," Conyers said, "and the use of it against the Jewish people in particular, who have been victims of the worst kind of discrimination, discrimination resulting in death, is offensive and wrong."

Perhaps the former peanut farmer from Georgia should go back to what he knows. Thanks to HonestReporting for keeping the public informed about the egregious and malicious falsehoods about Israel that are retailed as common currency these days. Visit www.honestreporting.com for more information.

12-year-old has a leading role in The Nutcracker

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

At 12 years old, becoming a professional dancer is more than a dream for Allie Drabinsky.

The Grade 7 student at Canada's National Ballet School is dancing one of the lead roles in the National Ballet's performance of The Nutcracker, playing at the Four Seasons Centre until Dec. 30. The new theatre, the first of its kind in Canada, was designed specifically for opera and ballet.

Allie is one of the dancers playing the part of Marie, a role that has her on stage, except for two costume changes, for the entire performance.

A former Bialik Hebrew Day School student, Allie entered NBS in Grade 6, after spending most of the summer prior auditioning at the school's summer session.

She has performed since in La Sylphide and in former dancer Veronica Tennant's production of Songs of Survival.

Risa, Allie's mother, says dancing has been in Allie's blood since she began taking lessons at age four in Los Angeles, where the family lived – Allie is the youngest of four children – for four years. "Her passion for dance was evident at a very early age."

With NBS classes often running until 6:30 p.m., and with a mandatory session in the summer, Allie admits ballet is a sacrifice, "but I wouldn't do anything else. I love it," she adds.

"I have long days at school, but if I was still at Bialik, I would be going to dance classes after school. This way everything is under one roof. NBS is one of the top in the world."

The school's training facilities are located in the new Celia Franca Centre and the adjoining R.A. Laidlaw Centre on Jarvis Street. Included are 12 studios, a fully equipped stage training facility, three sets of change rooms, a wardrobe department and theatrical dressing rooms.

The school also has a physiotherapy department, a conditioning gymnasium and an indoor swimming pool.

Academics are also stressed, says Allie, "because we need to be prepared for the outside world. Not all of us will continue with dance."

There are only 20 to 25 students per grade, she says, and students need to be asked back each year.

Also important, she says, are the school's health services. Specialists include physiotherapists, doctors, social workers and nutritionists who provide instruction on topics such as injury prevention, proper eating, personal fitness and lifestyle.

"They make sure we eat well, we're hydrated, and that we get enough sleep. Kids need direction on keeping up their strength."

Allie is dancing in nine performances of The Nutcracker, wearing a 10-pound costume. "I put on my costume [30 minutes] before the performance, and I can't sit down once it's on."

Does she get nervous before a performance? "Sure, but only before. Once I'm on stage, I only think about the dancing. I love it."

Allie will be dancing in performances of The Nutcracker on Dec. 16, 20, 23, 27, 29 and 30.

Short doc looks at Jews through Barbie-doll eyes

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

What does it mean to be Jewish? What does it mean to be a member of any tribe in the 21st century?

These are some of the questions The Tribe – an award-winning film, now on DVD, about the unauthorized history of the Jewish people and the Barbie doll – asks in its running time of about 15 minutes.

It doesn't really answer these questions, though. What it does do is piece together Jewish history and culture and somehow ties it together through the history of the Barbie doll, which, after all, was invented by Ruth Handler, a Jewish American.

Like the ever-changing Barbie, there is no such thing as a single Jewish identity. Within the Jewish tribe are hundreds of sub-tribes, all of them Jewish – in their own way – religious, atheist, affiliated, unaffiliated, kosher, non-kosher, gay, straight, etc.

> Like the ever-changing Barbie, there is no such thing as a single Jewish identity

The film is a lighthearted documentary narrated by Peter Coyote that combines fast editing, rap poetry and a witty script. The short film, directed by Tiffany Shlain and co-written by Shlain with Ken Goldberg, was an official selection at the 2006 Sundance Film Festival and won best short documentary at the Nashville Film Festival and the audience award at the Ann Arbor Film Festival.

Portraits in former ambassador's diary cut to the core

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Allan Gotlieb kept a diary of the swirl of events when he was Canada's ambassador to the United States from 1981 to 1989. He did not intend to publish the entries, but after leaving Washington, he changed his mind, believing they might be of interest to readers.

Judging by The Washington Diaries (McClelland & Stewart), he was absolutely right. This is an absorbing book.

Allan Gotlieb

Having had access to to the movers and shakers in American society, Gotlieb – who was undersecretary of state for external affairs before his appointment as ambassador – has mined his experiences for all they are worth. He is a keen observer and a sharp writer, and the combination is beguiling, amusing and revealing.

Early on, Gotlieb mentions his predecessor, Peter Towe. Gotlieb had recommended Klaus Goldschlag, a Jew of German ancestry, for the job, thinking that he was "the best foreign policy mind in the department." Don Jamieson, the minister of external affairs, disagreed with Gotlieb's assessment.

"Jamieson was convinced that the tall, cool, waspy Peter and his attractive socialite wife, Carole, would go down much better in Washington than a naturalized Jewish refugee from Berlin. He thus showed that he knew little or nothing about Washington."

Gotlieb arrived in Washington on a cold morning in December. "And off to the office I went. It's unbelievable." On day two, he writes, "I can't describe my emotions as I sit behind the beautiful antique desk in one of the most ornate offices in one of the most magnificent mansions in Embassy Row."

Gotlieb's pen portraits cut to the core.

Take, for example, the entry from Jan. 8, 1982: "The outgoing Israeli ambassador, Epi Evron, whom I knew when he was ambassador to Canada, said the one man I have to meet here is Robert Strauss. I listened, because when it comes to diplomats, there never was one more wily and cunning than Evron."

Gotlieb was indeed impressed by Strauss, a Texas lawyer and Democratic party stalwart. Noting that he was being urged to run for the presidency, Gotlieb, in a 1983 entry, observes, "Despite his awesome political sense and unrivalled political understanding of how to broker the zillion interests in the country, he stands no chance. He's Jewish."

Three years on, when Gotlieb meets Strauss again, Strauss makes a nasty claim about the syndicated newspaper columnists Robert Novak and Rowland Evans. "Novak is Jewish and anti-Semitic. Rowly Evans is a non-Jewish anti-Semite. I raised my eyebrows at this last one, but Strauss said that if I didn't know Rowly was an anti-Semite, I should be fired."

On March 27, 1982, Gotlieb attends a dinner to which only a handful of ambassadors are invited. "I was placed at the endlessly long table, separating the Saudi and the newly arrived Israeli ambassador. The former did not talk to the latter… The Israeli, Moshe Arens, was very hurt by the Saudi's snub." And then this: "Arens is smart but bloodless. He'll do well in Washington."

Some months later, Gotlieb explains the "antipathy" of Canada's prime minister, Pierre Trudeau, to Israel's prime minister, Menachem Begin.

"Curiously, Trudeau at first liked and admired Begin, particularly his tough stance on terrorists." But after Begin broke his promise not to inject Jerusalem into the forthcoming federal election, Trudeau felt "double-crossed and refused for a long time to meet with any Canadian Jewish leader." Gotlieb adds, "With Trudeau, there is no looking back – he has resented Israel ever since."

In this connection, Gotlieb recalls Trudeau's refusal to even reply to a B'nai Brith invitation to attend one of its conferences. Finally, after Gotlieb's intervention, Trudeau had the courtesy of replying. The answer was flat no. "To be frank with myself, I don't really understand why I have been busting my ass over this… I've never belonged to B'nai Brith, even as a kid. Maybe I just don't like being ineffective."

Gotlieb has a good sense of humour, despite his dour demeanour, and it emerges in an exchange on June 12, 1984, with Senator Ed Zorinsky of Nebraska. Zorinsky urges Canada to stop subsidizing the export of pork to the United States. After a pause, Gotlieb says, "Senator, don't you find it a bit strange, you calling me in here to lecture me about pork?" Zorinsky is puzzled. "I reply, 'A Jewish senator lecturing a Jewish ambassador about pork. That's not kosher.' At first the senator and his entourage seemed stunned. Then the senator started to laugh, and everyone broke up laughing. Great meeting after that…"

On occasion, Gotlieb can be cruel. Canada's foreign minister, Joe Clark, pays him a visit. "Then I discovered the paradox of Joe Clark: the more deeply he gets into a subject, the more superficial he seems to become. He is a man who shines on first exposure to light. But the greater the light, the duller the glow.'"

There are times when Gotlieb wishes he was somewhere else. Consider this entry on Nov. 18, 1985: "Gave a speech in Oklahoma… It was unmemorable in every respect: the trip, the city, the audience, the food, the speech."

On balance, however, Gotlieb enjoys his job immensely. When he finishes his assignment, the distinguished historian Michael Beschloss tells him that he has been "the most effective ambassador in Washington in the past 25 years."

Flattered, Gotlieb mentions the compliment in his last entry, recorded on Jan. 28, 1989: "Sheer vanity leads me to record these remarks. But I tell myself there are worse sins."

Kids encouraged to write to 'Bubbie and Zadie'

Bubbie and Zadie Come to My House: A Story for Hanukkah* by Daniel Halevi Bloom, Square One Publishers.

By PEARL ADLER SABAN
Special to The CJN

"A good heart is like a pretty candle burning in the menorah. It can light up the world."

Daniel Halevi Bloom believes that, and so does Zadie in Bubbie and Zadie Come to My House: A Story for Hanukkah.

The story tells of Bubbie and Zadie, a diminutive couple who, bundled up against the December cold, magically and mysteriously fly through the sky on the first night of Chanukah. They visit children everywhere, bringing with them the spirit of the holiday through songs and stories. With laughter and warmth, they enjoy the children they visit, sharing the explanation of Chanukah and taking part in the ages-old tradition of playing dreidel.

Like the weekly visit from the Sabbath Queen and the annual Passover visit from the prophet Elijah, Bubbie and Zadie are happily welcomed into each Jewish home. And it is only children who can see them.

"You can see them if you use the eye inside your mind - your imagination," the little boy narrator tells us.

Before Bubbie and Zadie take their leave, the children in the story are invited to write letters and stay in touch with them.

Bubbie and Zadie Come to My House is the first children's book to be published by Square One Publishers in New York. It is a newly revised and illustrated edition of the story, first published in 1985 by Donald I. Fine, Inc. Although the book has been out of print for more than 10 years, people have continued to read it, and it has kept the author busy.

From his home in Taiwan, where he works as a journalist, Bloom has personally responded to thousands of letters he's received from all over the world – letters addressed to "Bubbie and Zadie."

He started the letter-writing campaign in 1981, and the book followed. Bloom has received letters and e-mails from both children and adults, letters that talk about the excitement of the holiday, memories of family traditions, stories of the letter writer's own grandparents. Adults have told Bloom how meaningful the book is for them, how they have pulled it out each year to read aloud with family members. And Bloom has answered every one of these letters.

It is the joy he gets from reading the letters, as well as "memories of my own wonderful Chanukah as a kid and my sweet and dear grandparents" that has fed his enthusiasm all these years.

And his determination to get the book republished came from the realization that he was getting older and "if I didn't do something soon, I would die one day and the book would disappear."

Enter Rudy Shur, publisher and president of Square One Publishers. Last December, Shur recalled from his New York office, he read a New York Times article about this special children's book that had been out of print, yet continued to generate hundreds and hundreds of letters from around the world to "Bubbie and Zadie."

The article, as well as Bloom's gentle persistence, drew Shur's attention to the book and the possibility of reissuing it.

"For me, it was also the fact that I had never known my own grandparents, who had been killed in a concentration camp in Poland during World War II," Shur said. "Around the time that I first spoke with Dan Bloom, I found myself a zadie for the third time. I felt it was time for me to open myself up to this story – as a publisher and as a person."

Bloom and Shur had found each other across the miles. Then Shur found the Israel-based artist Alex Meilichson, whose painting style he felt was perfect for the story.

"There was no question that I had found the right artist for our version of the book. The question was: could Alex produce 28 paintings in eight weeks? The answer was: absolutely."

Meilichson, whose artistic style is influenced by Marc Chagall and Manne Katz, uses brilliant, bright colours throughout this book. Bubbie and Zadie not only fly through the sky, they fly off the pages.

Bloom, who never met or corresponded with the artist during the publishing process, is delighted with the artistry, layout and design of the new book.

In spite of the geographical distance between the author in Taiwan, the artist in Israel and the publisher in New York, "everything seemed to come together fairly well," Shur said. "Communication began with e-mails from the author in Taiwan and continued that way throughout the process."

Designed to be given to grandchildren the first night of Chanukah, this edition of the book invites readers to write letters to the "Bubbie and Zadie" characters in the story.

Each letter will be answered by return mail, free of charge, by the author, and by some real-life bubbies and zadies from Bubbie and Zadies L'Chaim House, a senior citizens home in San Rafael, Calif. Manny Kopstein, director of the home, is encouraged by the idea of authentic bubbies and zadies signing the letters as "Bubbie and Zadie."

In many ways, the letter-writing aspect is what excited Bloom the most about having the book made available again. "The magic and loving feelings of the Chanukah holidays, as passed down to me and those of my generation by our own bubbies and zadies when we were children, is one of the greatest gifts that can ever be given. And it's wonderful that these elderly people now want to share the tradition of the holidays with the children by helping to write letters to them."

Bloom hopes to be able to respond to "Bubbie and Zadie" letters for many years to come. He'd also like to see the book translated into Hebrew for the Israeli market. After that, the sky's the limit. "And a movie for Hollywood... A live-action movie or a cartoon. It might take 10 years, but that's my dream."

With his exuberance and the magical help of "Bubbie and Zadie," Bloom might just make that dream come true!

Children and adults can send their letters to:

c/o Square One Publishers

Garden City Park, N.Y., 11040

Bubbie and Zadie also welcome e-mail letters at bubbie.zadie@gmail.com.

Trying to preserve critical mass of Jewish community

By MATTHEW WAGNER
Jerusalem Post

The one million completely unaffiliated American Jews will probably be lost to assimilation and intermarriage no matter what happens, and therefore outreach efforts should focus on about three million Jews positioned between those who are committed to and those who are completely devoid of Judaism, said the chancellor-elect of the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Prof. Arnold M. Eisen said in an exclusive interview with the Jerusalem Post over the weekend, that "the answer [to assimilation and intermarriage] is not numbers, but quality," said Eisen, who was in Jerusalem to attend the cornerstone laying for the new campus of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies and its 19th rabbinic ordination ceremony. He will take office on July 1.

"We are losing one-quarter [of U.S. Jews], one-quarter is getting stronger, the middle we have to fight for, and most of them we lose," said Eisen, who is currently Koshland professor of Jewish culture and religion at Stanford University.

Eisen estimated that 20 per cent of the approximately five million Jews in the United States had no connection with Judaism.

"So they really are not there, except maybe for the fact that politicians want their vote. So you are losing one million that you did not have anyway. They matter because every Jew matters.

"But if I take the 20 per cent that are active and if I turn another 20 per cent into active [Jews] I have transformed the Jewish people. That two million out of four million would leave us in better shape than one million out of five million," he said.

In an hour-long interview, Eisen touched on intermarriage, the future of U.S. Jewry, the causes for the shrinking of the Conservative movement, and Zionism.

The incoming head of the Conservative Judaism's flagship rabbinical school refused to comment on two burning issues: ordination of homosexuals and lesbians, and same-sex marriage.

Last week the U.S. Conservative movement's committee on law and standards is expected to rule on the question of ordaining gays. In the past, Eisen, who is not a rabbi, has supported appointing gay rabbis. His selection to head JTS was seen as a harbinger for the upcoming rabbinic decision.

Sidestepping the issue, Eisen described a U.S. Jewry ravaged by intermarriage and assimilation.

"The question is what you can do to improve quality so that you obtain a critical mass of the Jewish community. You don't give up on any Jew, but I read the sociological trends and the numbers are bad. There are issues of quality that we can do a lot about. I see enormous possibilities," he said.

Arnold Eisen

Eisen described himself as an optimist in the sense that "I do not count numbers."

> 'You don't give up on any Jew, but I read the sociological trends and the numbers are bad'

Eisen, who has devoted most of his career to studying the ideological trends of contemporary American Judaism, including the causes of strong Jewish identity, said that he accepted the chancellor post because "I believe something can be done" to reduce intermarriage and assimilation.

"The intermarriage rate is not irreversible because it correlates with synagogue attendance, it correlates with commitment, it correlates with day school education, it correlates with strong identity. It also correlates with intervention efforts, as the Boston study proves," he said, referring to a recently released 2005 study conducted by Brandeis University's Steinhardt Social Research Institute on behalf of Boston's Combined Jewish Philanthropies.

"So if I get a stronger core, the intermarriage rate is going to decline. At the moment, if current trends continue, Orthodoxy will be a larger and larger percentage of American Judaism. That means the intermarriage rate will fall. This is good. So the bad thing to do is to project from the present as if the future is the same as the present, only more so and worse," he said.

Although Eisen admits that U.S. Jewry faces many demographic challenges. He rejects Jewish Agency Chair Zeev Bielski's prognosis, voiced during to the United Jewish Community's General Assembly in Los Angeles last month, that Jews have no future in America and should all move to Israel.

"Israel has many advantages in building Jewish communities, language first of all, but Israel doesn't have a monopoly on the possibility of building Jewish communities," said Eisen.

"Obviously there is a future for U.S. Jewry. I think that an Israeli Zionist should not want [Bielski] to be right. It is not in the interest of the Jewish people. Rather it is in the interest of the Jewish people that there be a strong Jewish future in the United States.

"We are not rivals. So we should get past that and have a realistic critique of Golah [exile] because there are a lot of real things to criticize about Golah. There really is anti-Semitism in this world and there really is assimilation in this world.

"And the Zionist analysis was generally correct about these things. I say this as an American Jew and as a scholar. But to get carried away and say, 'There is no future' is wrong and unhelpful," he said.

Eisen pledged to strengthen ties between Conservative Jews and Israel. "It bothers me to no end that two-thirds of American Jews feel no connection with Israel [according to studies by sociologist Steven Cohen].

"I believe as a scholar that the existence and the vitality of the U.S. Jewish community depends on the existence and the vitality of Israel. And I believe, unfortunately, that the same is true of Israel. I really think we are mutually dependent. Politically and religiously we are interdependent," he said.

Eisen is planning a "new operation for co-operation" that will bring more Conservative rabbis, cantors, educators and laypeople to Israel. The aim is to strengthen the feeling of a shared destiny among Diaspora and Israeli Jews. "If I do nothing else as chancellor I will do this. If I fail at this I will be a failure. This is why I took the job."

Summer hockey tournament to commemorate war vs. Hezbollah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

One year to the day after Israel's deadly war with Hezbollah began, the northern town of Metulla will mark the occasion with an event that is being seen as a symbolic affirmation of life.

Metulla's Canada Center, the sports facility built with financial support of Canadian Jews, will host a hockey tournament starting on July 12, 2007 that will bring together teams from at least five Jewish communities around the world.

Canada, the United States, Israel, France, Mexico and perhaps a European team consisting of Russians, Swedes and Finns, will compete for bragging rights at the tournament.

Organizers are also hoping to attract spectators from the Diaspora in a unique mission that will combine hockey in the Holy Land, a rewarding Israeli tourist experience as well as a solemn commemoration of the war which broke out on July 12, 2006.

Metulla, which abuts Israel's northern border with Lebanon, was in the line of fire during the conflict, which began when Hezbollah terrorists killed eight Israeli soldiers and kidnapped two others. Since then Canada Center's Olympic sized rink has remained closed but organizers have been assured it will be open for business when the first puck drops.

The tournament is the brainchild of Montreal businessman Alan Maislin, who heads the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel. He's hopeful the event will produce the best calibre of hockey in Israel since the 1997 Maccabiah Games, when the winter sport was added for the one and only time to the "Jewish Olympics."

Stocked with professionals, major junior stars and college players, Canada dominated the tournament and defeated the United States in the championship game.

This time around the quality should be just as good. The French squad will include three players from the country's national team. Israel will be coached by Stanley Cup winner Jean Perron, who led the Habs to the NHL title in 1986. France will be coached by Canadian expat Dave Henderson.

The American team will be managed by Neil Smith, the architect of the New York Rangers' 1994 Cup win, while the U.S. coach is expected to be former L.A. King player and general manager Dave Taylor.

Will Jeff Halpern, seen here as a Washington Capital, be on the American team at next summer's hockey tournament in Metulla?

Canada's team will be put together by Charles Henry, manager of the Gatineau Olympiques, who had the same task prior to the '97 Maccabiah. Canada's coaching staff has yet to be determined but Maislin is hopeful some name coaches with NHL experience will be behind the Canadian bench.

As for players, Maislin said that will be up to Henry and his scouting staff, but he expected the roster to consist of professionals, including perhaps an NHLer or two, plus Major Junior players and skaters from the college ranks.

The idea for the tournament took root last spring at the IIHF Division Division I Championships in Amiens, France. While scouting France, one of Israel's opponents, Maislin noticed three players with Jewish-sounding names. He later met with them, suggested a revival of the Maccabiah tournament and found they were receptive to the idea.

At subsequent IIHF meetings, Maislin met with representatives from Mexico and Sweden and again found interest in his proposal.

Working his international contacts, Maislin was able to put together the event. Sid Greenberg, long associated with Maccabi Canada, agreed to come on board as tournament chair and in the United States, hockey enthusiast Caleb Koeppel agreed to chair the U.S. team.

Koeppel, a New York real estate investor, is a former U.S. college player with Trinity College (Hartford). He still laces up his skates four times a week in the Road Warriors' Skate at Chelsea Piers recreational complex, where Smith also plays.

Koeppel said the U.S. team will "be representative of Jewish American hockey players" with a nucleus drawn from NCAA college ranks. One player he has in mind is Matthew Cohen, the captain of Yale. If the Americans go the NHL route, they can look to Jeff Halpern, Matthieu Schneider and Eric Nystrom (son of one time Islander Bob Nystrom).

Whether they'll play is unclear but Koeppel believes adding pros gives the tournament more credibility and brings up the quality of play all-round. "They will open the ice and create ice for everybody...They play at a different level," he said. "I'm optimistic because of personal relationships we may be able to get some of them to play."

At this point in the process, Henry is keeping his cards close to the vest. He expects Canada's team will consist of players from the pro, junior and college ranks, but he hasn't closed the door to open tryouts. One skater he's got his eye on is Benjamin Rubin, the 17-year-old Orthodox player recruited by Patrick Roy's Quebec Ramparts, even though he won't play on the Sabbath.

The bottom line for Henry, as for Maislin and Greenberg, is to put together the best team available.

"All coaches at the NHL level want to win," Greenberg said.

Greenberg will travel to Israel in January to check out Canada Center and to make sure the big rink will be ready for the tournament.

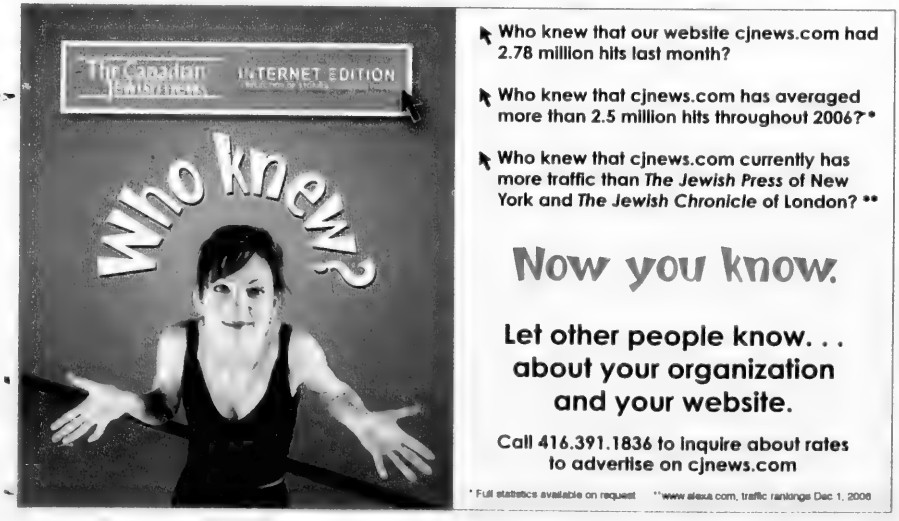
Maislin has been in contact with the United Israel Appeal, which funnels funds raised in Canada to recipients in Israel, and with the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, to make sure the rink is in good shape and to organize a support mission to Israel.

Adam Minsky, director of Israel and overseas programs for UJA Federation, has been charged with arranging a mission to view the tournament and tour the country.

"On a symbolic level, it would be powerful to be there one year later in large numbers," he said.

Koeppel sees it that way too. "I think the tournament is important in much the same way birthright israel is important. It will introduce a large group of people who would not otherwise be introduced to Israel."

And as for opening the event on the first anniversary of the outbreak of war, Koeppel believes "it shows that life goes on and that nobody is going to hold us down."



Inside Back

The drive to drive

By MICHAEL GORDON

'My father's very angry with you and with me for bringing him to you."

We were just starting a follow-up appointment for Ben's problem with cognitive decline. The medical resident had finished the geriatric ambulatory evaluation clinic, and we were interviewing the patient who was accompanied by his daughter.

"Generally his condition is stable," the resident said, "with no real decline in his mental or physical function."

Ben then piped up, "I must get my licence back. There is no reason that I can't drive. I am losing money because I can't visit my buildings to check that everything is OK and speak to the superintendents. How do I know if they are doing their job?" The daughter's expression said it all while he continued to focus on this subject.

"Where are the properties?" I asked.

"Mostly in north Toronto," he replied. "I only have a few low-rises left. I need to see them to know they are OK. I can't do this without my car."

I suggested that there were other ways to get to the places he needed without a car. He looked at me quizzically. "Ben, last time you were here I explained why I had to report you to the Ministry of Transportation. We discussed the cost of running your car compared to the cost of taking taxis to wherever you need to go."

His daughter looked at him and said, "Dad, we talked about this as well last week, and I showed you all the costs and we figured you could take hundreds of taxis a year for those costs."

Ben looked at her and then at me and said, "You don't understand, in my business I have to visit the buildings to make sure everything is OK, and not having a car makes it impossible. I don't understand why you took my licence away."

This scenario repeats itself a few times a month in my weekly half-day geriatric clinic. The issue of driving is one of the most contentious challenges that physicians dealing with an increasingly elderly population face. Sometimes the difficulty in dealing with the problem stems from the fact that patients know they are going to the physician for a specifc reason. Yet, even if the reason they are there is related to memory problems, they have never contemplated that their driving may be curtailed by the end of the interview. Even if the family is grateful that finally a doctor has acted on what they have been concerned about for many months or longer, the results can be devastating to the patient. I am periodically asked to provide a second opinion because the patient believes another doctor erred and that coming to me would reverse the decision – a decidedly rare occurrence.

The Senior Side of Life

The Ministry of Transportation rules are somewhat ambiguous about cognitive impairment as a cause for mandatory reporting compared to other neurological disorders such as epilepsy. The ministry regulation says, "Every legally qualified medical practitioner shall report to the Registrar of Motor Vehicles… who, in the opinion of the medical practitioner, is suffering from a condition that may make it dangerous for the person to operate a motor vehicle." The challenge for physicians is that the reporting duty is mandatory and instructions stipulate the duty with the imprecise term "may." Most physicians, being aware of the increased likelihood of accidents involving people with cognitive impairment, feel duty-bound to report the person. It is the government's role to act on the report and decide whether or not to remove the driver's licence.

One option that sometimes allows for a deferral of the decision in borderline situations is to refer to a third-party non-governmental driving assessment programs such as DriveABLE (www.driveable.com). It evaluates the driving abilities of the person, and its reports may inform the ultimate reporting decision and sometime effect the ministry's final decision. The fee is $495. Some individuals resent having to pay to keep their licence. The program, being non-governmental, assures all parties that it is unbiased. I frequently recommend that route and most participants feel it was worthwhile.

Losing one's driving licence seriously affects mobility, independence and one's sense of dignity. However, driving is a privilege not a right. Physicians are obligated to serve the public safety even at the expense of those patients under their care.

Vegetable & Feta Latkes

2 1/2 c grated zucchini
1 c peeled and shredded potatoes
1 c shredded carrots
1/2 tsp salt
3 eggs, lightly beaten
salt to taste
freshly ground black pepper
3/4 c matzo meal
1/2 c chopped fresh parsley
1/2 c crumbled feta cheese
1/4 c vegetable oil

Squeeze moisture out of zucchini, potato and carrots over a colander. Sprinkle salt over vegetables; let drain for 15 min. Squeeze vegetables again in paper towels.

In large mixing bowl combine eggs, vegetables, salt and pepper. Mix well. Stir in matzo meal, parsley and feta.

Heat vegetable oil in large frying pan. Place vegetable mixture, formed into pancake sized cakes in hot oil and fry until golden brown on both sides, about 2-3 min. each. Add more oil as needed to keep latkes frying up well. Drain fried latkes on paper towels. Yield: 6 servings.

Postmodern Chanukahs lessons

At different ages, we teach and learn the Chanukah story in different ways. The same is true of different moments in our history.

Seymour Epstein

There is a short essay by Chaim Nachman Bialik from the 1920s in which he pleads with secular members of the Yishuv in Palestine to see value in Chanukah as a national holiday that unites us with our past and gives purpose to our future.

When we are very young, we learn of the heroics of Judah the Maccabee in valiant struggle against the forces of Antiochus and the Syrian-Greeks. As we mature, we come to understand some of the more subtle complexities internal to the Jewish population of the time. A careful reading of the non-biblical books of the Maccabees, other primary sources and Victor Tcherikover's Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews gives us, as adults, a more detailed perspective, a truer account of the times, and a greater appreciation of the complexity of the historic moment than we had in some pre-bar/bat mitzvah classroom.

One of the lessons we learn from such study is that we were not one people back then, in the same way that we are not one today (notwithstanding the slogan, "We are one!"). Of course, it's simple in retrospect (some would say, simplistic) to see the Hasmoneans as all good and the Hellenizing Jews as all wrong.

However, once we move the scene to our century, in a postmodern world, values such as pluralism and democracy (which are not inherently Jewish) require most of us to recognize the worth of diversity in the Jewish world.

It's entirely possible that some of our most strongly identifying Jews in our community are more assimilated to the values and customs of the majority culture than some of the "worst" Hellenizers. But such is the 21st century, and perhaps one of the lessons of Chanukah is that our lights are glaringly different than the lights of old, but still brightly shining.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Moving – meshaneh makom, meshaneh mazal

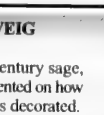
The Chafetz Chaim, a 20th-century sage, was visited by a friend who commented on how sparsely the wise man's home was decorated.

He asked the Chafetz Chaim where all his worldly goods were. The Chafetz Chaim replied, 'Where, my friend, are all your belongings?" The visitor said, "Why, I am simply passing through." The Chafetz Chaim responded, "Indeed, that is my reason as well for having so few material things. I, too, am simply passing through this world and need very little."



URBAN WRITER

This lofty approach to life is one seldom practised by most of us. I have just gone through a move and was disappointed with the number of boxes required to hold my worldly belongings – "Avrum, downstairs study, CDs'; "Avrum, upstairs kitchen, cookbooks."

Boxes were everywhere, filled with things I have amassed over 40 years. Some of them reflect moments in my history, such as my collection of tapes from 10 years of working in radio; others are packed with reminders and keepsakes.

Things, things and more things. I own three-dozen shirts, five suit jackets, five guitars, two sets of bongo drums and 12 harmonicas. While I was moving, I looked at the boxes and two things struck me: my father took nothing with him, and most of the things I own do not make me happier.

Moving – I was intrigued by the movers. They were skinny but strong, like the Sherpa (an ethnic group from the mountainous region of Nepal, highly regarded as experts in mountaineering and often hired as employees for expeditions in the Himalayas), able to manipulate a solid wood shelf with four drawers around a tricky turn in our hallway and down a set of stairs, with a keen geometric understanding.

The youngest of the movers was 21 years old. He told me he scored 94 in high school English. I encouraged him to read and write a lot. He seemed surprised I had taken interest in his intellect.

Another of the movers was more seasoned and rough. He told me he had furnished his house with items he'd received from individuals he moved. Recently, he bought a 42-inch Trinitron TV for $50. I gave him my old motorcycle gloves. I sold my bike this summer after my son was born. It seemed wise.

The third mover was in his mid-40s but appeared older. He'd been a mover for 15 years and the strain of lifting pianos (which pays an extra $20 per mover) and moving entire homes had affected him physically, like an old quarterback.

Moving – it is generally unsettling and high on the scale of things that cause people stress, especially when you are neither rooted in your new place or your old home. On the other hand, there is something exciting and refreshing about moving. A friend told me it allows him to cleanse his life, throw away the old and useless (a popular rule is, if you haven't looked at it, touched it or used it in one year, toss it) and file and organize those things that make up one's personal archive.

There are those people who move regularly. A colleague told me he had moved 15 times in 25 years – from continent to continent and then neighbourhood to neighbourhood. We all know people who live today in the very same home they lived in 40 years ago. Speak to them about moving and the best they can come up with are distant memories.

So with all of this, why do we move at all? Perhaps we do because the old Jewish adage meshaneh makom, meshaneh mazal (change your place, you change your luck) is true. Each move is a bid to make our lives better through change and fresh walls that allow us a new start and a homeful rebirth.

Chag samayach to all our readers

The rolling mists of the Tel Aviv-Jaffa shoreline so hauntingly captured by Daniel Alexander in the photo above can be seen as a metaphor.

The clarity and familiarity of shapes and temporal bearings that are occasionally obscured always re-emerge and re-assert themselves anew in the fullness of recurring light.

Chanukah, chag ha'urim, the holiday of light, reminds us of this.

It is either the singular, melancholy or character-building poignance of our fate that the current events of Jewish life unfailingly underscore the timeless relevance of our festivals and celebrations. Such is especially the case this year with Chanukah.

Editorial

The darkness of the season bespeaks the darkness of the times. In the past four decades, Israel has seldom seemed as vulnerable to the malign intentions of its enemies as it is today. And one enemy in particular – Iran – taunts the Jewish state and shouts its menace with the disquieting regularity of an obsessed and obsessive fanatic at a football match.

But unlike the obnoxious football fanatic, this loudmouth is dangerous. He has his dogma, eschatological objectives, military might and a rabid following.

There is thus good reason for the Jewish state, and indeed the civilized world, to be deeply worried. But never in the Jewish past has vulnerability ever trumped resolve; never has deep worry trumped strong-heartedness.

Nor, as the holiday of Chanukah proves, has darkness ever trumped light.

We must take heart from the holiday's core message: that against all odds, the few did indeed vanquish the many, and that the darkness that frightens and the mists that obscure are always lifted by light.

In this year's Chanukah supplement, we are pleased to offer a variety of readings, the centrepiece of which is a four-part JTA investigative essay by award-winning author Edwin Black.

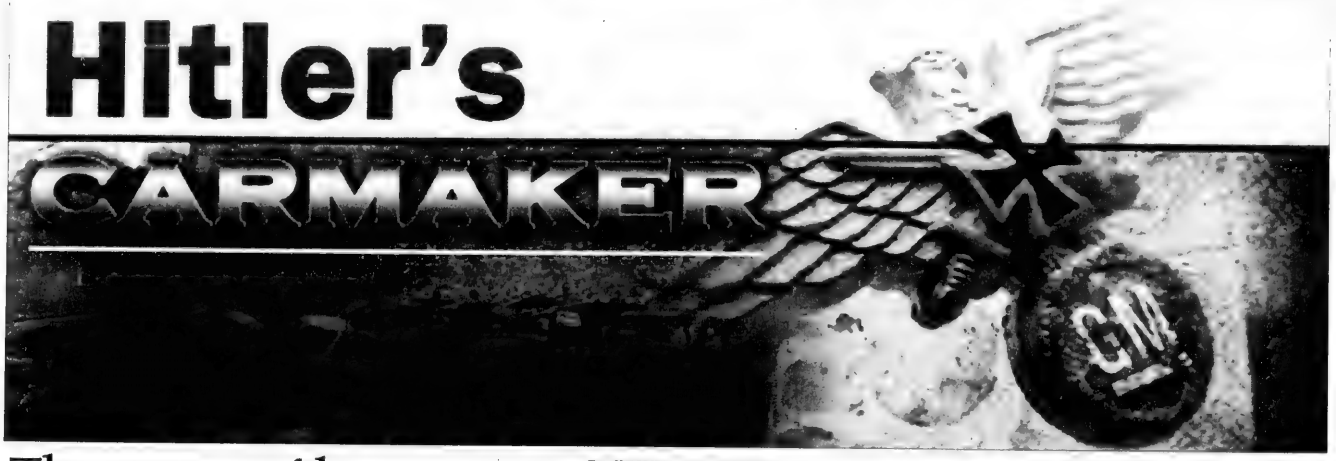
Black exposes the role played by General Motors in helping build up the industrial capability of the Nazi Reich before and during World War II.

We are also pleased to once again co-operate with Canada Israel Experience and publish the top 10 submissions in their annual alumni photo "contest" sponsored by El Al Israel Airlines, the birthright israel Alumni Association, Canada Israel Experience and Empire Restaurant and Lounge.

We hope you enjoy the offerings in this supplement. And we hope, of course, that you enjoy a meaningful holiday with family and loved ones.

Hold onto and be inspired by the light.

Hitler's CARMAKER



The story of how General Motors helped mobilize the Third Reich

By EDWIN BLACK
JTA

James D. Mooney thrust his arm diagonally, watching its reflection in his hotel suite mirror. Not quite right. He tried once again. Still not right. Was it too stiff? Too slanted? Should his palm stretch perpendicular to the ceiling; should his arm bend at a severe angle? Or should the entire limb extend straight from shoulder to fingertips? Should his Sieg Heil project enthusiasm or declare obedience? Never mind, it was afternoon. Time to go see Hitler.

Just the day before, May 1, 1934, under a brilliant, cloudless sky, Mooney, president of the General Motors Overseas Corporation, climbed into his automobile and drove toward Tempelhof Field at the outskirts of Berlin to attend yet another hypnotic Nazi extravaganza. This one was the annual "May Day" festival.

Tempelhof Field was a sprawling, oblong-shaped airfield. But for May Day, the immense site was converted into parade grounds. Security was more than tense, it was paranoid. All cars entering the area were meticulously inspected for anti-

GM has steadfastly denied it helped the Nazis

Hitler pamphlets or other contraband. But not Mooney's. The Fuehrer's office had sent over a special windshield tag that granted the General Motors' chief carte blanche to any area of Tempelhof.

Mooney would be Hitler's special guest.

As Mooney arrived at the airfield, about 3:30 in the afternoon, the spectacle dazzled him. Sweeping swastika banners stretching 33 feet wide and soaring 150 feet into the air fluttered from 43-ton steel towers. Each tower was anchored in 13 feet of concrete to resist the winds as steadfastly as the Third Reich resisted all efforts to moderate its program of rearmament and oppression.

Thousands of other Nazi flags fluttered across the grounds as dense column after column of Nazis, marching shoulder to shoulder in syncopation, flowed into rigid formation. Each of the 13 parade columns boasted between 30,000 and 90,000 storm troopers, army divisions, citizen brigades and blond-blue Hitler Youth enrollees.

Finally, after four hours, the tightly packed assemblage totalled about two million marchers and attendees.

Hitler eventually arrived in an open-air automobile that cruised up and down the field amid the sea of devotees. Accompanied by cadres of SS guards, Hitler was ushered to the stage, stopping first to pat the head of a smiling boy. This would be yet another grandiose spectacle of Fuehrer-worship so emblematic of the Nazi regime.

When ready, Hitler launched into one of his enthralling speeches, made all the more mesmerizing by 142 loudspeakers sprinkled throughout the grounds. As the Fuehrer demanded hard work and discipline, and enunciated his vision of National Socialist destiny, the crisp sound of his voice travelled across an audience so vast that it took a moment or two for his words to reach the outer perimeter of the throng. Hence, the thunderous applause that greeted Hitler's remarks arrived sequentially, creating an aural effect of continuous, overlapping waves of adulation.

Mooney went to meet Hitler in the German leader's Chancellery office

General Motors World, the company house organ, covered the May Day event glowingly in a several-page cover story, stressing Hitler's boundless affinity for children. "By nine, the streets were full of people waiting to see Herr Hitler go meet the children," the publication reported.

The next day, May 2, 1934, after practising his Sieg Heil in front of a mirror, Mooney and two other senior executives from General Motors and its German division, Adam Opel A.G., went to meet Hitler in his Chancellery office. Waiting with Hitler would be Nazi Party stalwart Joachim von Ribbentrop, who would later become foreign minister, and Reich economic adviser Wilhelm Keppler.

As Mooney traversed the long approach to Hitler's desk, he began to pump his arm in a stern-faced Sieg Heil. But the Fuehrer surprised him by getting up from his desk and meeting Mooney halfway, not with a salute but a businesslike handshake.

This was, after all, a meeting about business – one of many contacts between the Nazis and GM officials that are spotlighted in this multi-part JTA investigation that scoured and re-examined thousands of pages of little-known and restricted Nazi-era and New Deal-era documents

This documentation and other evidence reveals that GM and Opel were eager, willing and indispensable cogs in the Third Reich's rearmament juggernaut, a rearmament that, as many feared during the 1930s, would enable Hitler to conquer Europe and destroy millions of lives. The documentation also reveals that while General Motors was mobilizing the Third Reich and co-operating within Germany with Hitler's Nazi revolution and economic recovery, GM and its president, Alfred P. Sloan, were undermining the New Deal of Franklin D. Roosevelt and undermining America's electric mass transit, and in doing so were helping addict the United States to oil.

For GM's part, the company has repeatedly declined to comment when approached by this reporter. It has also steadfastly denied for decades – even in the halls of Congress – that it actively assisted the Nazi war effort or that it simultaneously subverted mass transit in the United States. It has also argued that its subsidiary was seized by the Reich during the war. The company even sponsored an eminent historian to investigate, and he later in his own book disputed many earlier findings about GM's complicity with the Nazis. In that book, he concluded that assertions that GM had collaborated with the Nazis even after the United States and Germany were at war "have proved groundless."

Mass use of autos seen as part of Germany's great destiny

A Fascination With Four Wheels

Hitler knew that the biggest auto and truck manufacturer in Germany was not Daimler or any other German carmaker. The biggest automotive manufacturer in Germany – indeed in all of Europe – was General Motors, which since 1929 had owned and operated the longtime German firm Opel. GM's Opel, infused with millions in GM cash and assembly-line know-how, produced some 40 per cent of the vehicles in Germany and about 65 per cent of its exports. Indeed, Opel dominated Germany's auto industry.

Impressive production statistics aside, the Fuehrer was fascinated with every aspect of the automobile, its history, its inherent liberating appeal and, of course, its application as a weapon of war. While German automotive engineers were famous for their engineering innovations, the lack of ready petroleum supplies and gas stations in Germany, coupled with the nation's massive depression unemployment, kept autos out of reach for the common man in Nazi Germany. In 1928, just before the Depression hit, one in five Americans owned a car, while in Germany, ownership was one in 134.

In fact, just two months before Mooney's meeting at the Chancellery, Hitler had commented at the Berlin International Automobile and Motor Cycle Show: "It can only be said with profound sadness that, in the present age of civilization, the ordinary hard-working citizen is still unable to afford a car, a means of up-to-date transport and a source of enjoyment in the leisure hours."

Even if few Germans could afford cars – GM or otherwise – the company did provide many in the Third Reich with jobs. Hitler was keenly aware that GM, unlike German carmakers, used mass production techniques pioneered in Detroit, so-called "Fordism" or "American production."

As the May 2, 1934, Chancellery meeting progressed, Hitler thanked Mooney and GM for being a major employer – some 17,000 jobs – in a Germany where Nazi success hinged on re-employment. Moreover, since Opel was responsible for some 65 per cent of auto exports, the company also earned the foreign currency the Reich desperately needed to purchase raw materials for re-employment as well as for the regime's crash rearmament program. Now, as Hitler embarked on a massive, threatening rearmament program, GM was in a position to make Germany's military a powerful, modern and motorized marvel.

The Quest For The 'People's Car'

During the meeting with Mooney, Hitler estimated that if Germany were to emulate American ratios, the Reich should possess some 12 million cars. But, Hitler added, three million cars was a more realistic target under the circumstances. Even this would be a vast improvement over the 104,000 vehicles manufactured in Germany in 1932.

Mooney told Hitler that GM was willing to mass produce a cheap car, costing just 1,400 marks, with the mass appeal of Henry Ford's Model T, if the Nazi regime could guarantee 100,000 car sales annually, issue a decree limiting dealer commissions and control the price of raw materials. Many automotive concerns were vying for the chance to build Hitler's dream, a people's car or "volkswagen," but GM was convinced it alone possessed the proven production know-how. An excited Hitler showered his GM guests with many questions.

Would the cost of garaging a car be prohibitive for the average man? Could vehicles parked outdoors be damaged by the elements? Mooney answered that the same vehicle built to withstand wind, dust and rain at 40 m.p.h. to 60 m.p.h. could stand up to overnight exposure outdoors. To promote automobile ownership Hitler even promised something as trivial as legalized street parking.

Of course, Hitler had already committed the Reich to expedite completion of the world's first transnational network of auto highways, the Autobahn. Now, to further promote motorcar proliferation, Hitler suggested to Mooney that the German government could also reduce gasoline prices and gasoline taxes. Hitler even asked if Opel could advise him how to prudently reduce car insurance rates, thus lowering overall operating costs for average Germans.

The conference in Hitler's Chancellery office, originally scheduled for a quarter hour, stretched to 90 minutes.

The conference originally scheduled for a quarter hour, stretched to 90 minutes

The next morning, May 3, 1934, an excited Hitler told Keppler, "I have been thinking all night about the many things that these Opel men told me." He instructed Keppler, "Get in touch with them before they leave Berlin." Hitler wanted to know still more. Mooney spent hours later that day ensconced in his hotel suite composing written answers to the Fuehrer's many additional questions.

Clearly, Hitler saw the mass adoption of autos as part of Germany's great destiny. No wonder Mooney and GM were optimistic about the prospects for a strategic relationship with Nazi Germany.

A few weeks after the prolonged Chancellery session, the company publication, General Motors World, effusively recounted the meeting, proclaiming, "Hitler is a strong man, well fitted to lead the German people out of their former economic distress… He is leading them, not by force or fear, but by intelligent planning and execution of fundamentally sound principles of government."

Ironically, Hitler's famous inability to follow up on ideas caused GM officials to wonder if they had been too revealing in their company publication's coverage of the Chancellery meeting. Copies of General Motors World were seized by Opel company officials before they could circulate in Germany. Mooney later declared he would do nothing to make Adolf Hitler angry.

For Mooney, and for Germany's branch of GM, the relationship with the Third Reich was first and foremost about making money – billions in 21st century dollars – off the Nazi desire to re-arm even though the world expected that Germany would plunge Europe and America into a devastating war.

Typical of news coverage of events at the time was an article in the March 26, 1933, edition of The New York Times, headlined "Hitler a Menace."

Sloan was the decision-making force

The article, quoting former Princeton University President John Hibben, echoed the war fear spreading across both sides of the Atlantic. "Adolf Hitler is a menace to the world's peace, and if his policies bring war to Europe, the United States cannot escape participating," the article opened. This was one of dozens of such articles that ran in American newspapers of the day, complemented by continuous radio and newsreel coverage in the same vein.

However, the commanding, decision-making force at the carmaker was not Mooney, GM's man in Nazi Germany, but rather the company's cold and calculating president Alfred P. Sloan, who operated out of corporate headquarters in Detroit and New York.

Who was Sloan?

Mr. Big Sloan lived for bigness. Slender and natty, attired in the latest collars and ties, Sloan commonly wore spats, even to the White House. He often out-dressed his former GM boss, billionaire Pierre du Pont.

An electrical engineer by training, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology graduate was a strategic thinker who was as driven by a compulsion to grow his company as he was compelled to breathe oxygen.

"Deliberately to stop growing is to suffocate," Sloan wrote in his 1964 autobiography about his years at GM. "We do things in a big way in the United States. I have always believed in planning big, and I have always discovered after the fact that, if anything, we didn't plan big enough. I put no ceiling on progress."

For Sloan, motorizing the fascist regime that was expected to wage a bloody war in Europe was the next big thing and a spigot of limitless profits for GM. But unlike many commercial collaborators with the Nazis who were driven strictly by the icy quest for profits, Sloan also harboured a political motivation. Sloan despised the emerging American way of life being crafted by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Sloan hated Roosevelt's New Deal, and admired the strength, irrepressible determination and sheer magnitude of Hitler's vision.

> Admired the strength, determination and magnitude of Hitler's vision

For Sloan, the New Deal – with its Social Security program, government regulation and support for labour unions – clanged an unmistakable death knell for an America made great by great corporations guided by great corporate leaders.

In a 1934 letter to Roosevelt's Industrial Advisory Board, Sloan complained bitterly that the New Deal was attempting to change the rules of business so "government and not industry [shall] constitute the final authority." In Sloan's view, GM was bigger than mere governments, and its corporate executives were vastly more suited to decision-making than "politicians" and bureaucrats who he felt were profoundly unqualified to run the country. Government officials, Sloan believed, merely catered to voters and prospered from backroom deals.

Sloan pressured GM executives not to serve in government

Sloan's disdain for the American government went beyond ordinary political dissent. The GM chief so hated the president and his administration that he co-founded a virulently anti-Roosevelt organization, and donated to at least one other Roosevelt-bashing group. Moreover, Sloan actually pressured GM executives not to serve in government positions, although many disregarded his advice and loyally joined the government's push for war preparedness.

At one point, Sloan's senior officials at GM even threatened to launch a deliberate business slowdown to sabotage the administration's recovery plan, according to papers unearthed by one historian. At the same time, Sloan and GM did not fail to express admiration for the stellar accomplishments of the Third Reich, and went the extra mile to advance German economic growth.

Indeed, Sloan felt that GM could – and should – create its own foreign policy, and back the Hitler regime even as America recoiled from it. "Industry must assume the role of enlightened industrial statesmanship," Sloan declared in an April 1936 quarterly report to GM stockholders. "It can no longer confine its responsibilities to the mere physical production and distribution of goods and services. It must aggressively move forward and attune its thinking and its policies toward advancing the interest of the community at large, from which it receives a most valuable franchise."

In ramping up auto production in the Nazi Reich, Sloan understood completely that he was not just manufacturing vehicles. Sloan and Hitler both knew that GM, by creating wealth and shrinking unemployment, was helping to prop up the Hitler regime.

When explaining his ideas of mass production to Opel car dealers, Sloan proudly declared what the enterprise would mean: "The motor car contributes more to the wealth of the United States than agriculture. The automobile industry is a wealth-creating industry." What was true in America would become true in Germany.

Ironically, GM chose the alliance with Hitler even though doing so threatened to imperil GM at home. Just days after Hitler came to power on Jan. 30, 1933, a worldwide anti-Nazi boycott erupted, led by the American Jewish Congress, the Jewish War Veterans and a coalition of anti-fascist, pro-labour, interfaith and American patriotic groups. Their objective was to fracture the German economy, not resurrect it.

The anti-Nazi protesters vowed not only to boycott German goods, but to picket and cross-boycott any American companies doing business with Germany. In the beginning, few understood that in boycotting Opel of Germany, they were actually boycotting GM of Detroit. Effectively, they were one and the same.

As the Nazis amassed power, what did General Motors know, and when?

By the spring of 1933, the world was beginning to learn about the lawlessness and savagery of the Nazi regime, and the Reich's determination to crush its Jewish community and threaten its neighbours.

On March 27, 1933, a million protesters jammed Madison Square Garden in New York, and millions more around the world joined in a co-ordinated show of protest against Nazi brutality. By May 10, 1933, Nazi-banned books were being torched in public bonfires across Germany. The corporate library at General Motors' Opel in Germany was purged as well, of Jewish-authored publications and other undesirable literature.

Beginning in the late spring of 1933, concentration camps such as Dachau were generating headlines reporting great brutality.

By June 1933, Jews everywhere in Germany were being banned from the professional, economic and cultural life of the country. As state-designated pariahs, they were forbidden to remain members of the German Automobile Association, the popular organization for the general German motorist. Hitler's anti-Semitic demagoguery and the daily, semi-official, violent attacks against Jews were discussed in the American media almost daily.

GM's president Alfred P. Sloan knew what was happening in Germany. Sloan and GM officials knew also that Hitler's regime was expected to wage war from the outset. Headlines, radio broadcasts and newsreels made that fact apparent. America, it was feared, would once again be pulled in.

Nonetheless, GM and Germany began a strategic business relationship. That relationship is largely the focus of this JTA investigative series that re-examines the company's conduct on both sides of the Atlantic before, during and immediately after World War II. This four-part investigation reveals that while General Motors was helping mobilize the Third Reich, it was conspiring to demobilize America's electric mass transit, and in the process, was helping addict the United States to oil.

GM was one of Germany's leading employers in 1938

Unleashing The Blitzkrieg

Opel became an essential element of the German rearmament and modernization Hitler required to subjugate Europe. To accomplish that, Germany needed to rise above the horse-drawn divisions it deployed in World War I. It needed to motorize, to "blitz," that is, to attack with lightning speed. Germany would later unleash a Blitzkrieg, a lightning war. Opel built the three-ton truck named "Blitz" – to support the German military. The Blitz truck became the mainstay of the Blitzkrieg.

Quickly, Sloan and James D. Mooney, GM's overseas chief, realized that the Reich military machine was in fact the corporation's best customer in Germany. Sales to the army yielded a greater per truck profit than civilian sales – a hefty 40 per cent more. So GM preferred supplying the military, which never ceased its preparations to wage war against Europe.

In 1935, GM agreed to locate a new factory at Brandenburg, where it would be geographically less vulnerable to feared aerial bombardment by Allied forces. In 1937, almost 17 per cent of Opel's Blitz trucks were sold directly to the Nazi military.

That military sales figure was increased to 29 per cent in 1938 – totalling some 6,000 Blitz trucks that year alone. The Wehrmacht, the German military, soon became Opel's No. 1 customer by far. Other important customers included major industries associated with the Hitler war machine.

Expanding its German workforce from 17,000 in 1934 to 27,000 in 1938 also made GM one of Germany's leading employers. Unquestionably, GM's Opel became an integral facet of Hitler's Reich.

More than just an efficient manufacturer, Opel openly embraced the bizarre philosophy that powered the Nazi military-industrial complex. The German company participated in cultic Fuehrer worship as a part of its daily corporate ethic. After all, until GM purchased Opel in 1929 for $33.3 million, or about one-third of GM's after-tax profit that year, Opel was an established carmaker with a respected German persona. The Opel family included several prominent Nazi Party members. This identity appealed to rank-and-file Nazis who condemned anything foreign-owned or foreign-made.

For all these reasons, during the Hitler years, Sloan and Mooney both made efforts to obscure Opel's American ownership and control. As a result, the average storm trooper, Nazi Party member or German motorist accepted the company's cars and trucks as the product of a purely Aryan firm that was working toward Hitler's great destiny: "Deutschland ueber alles."

Opel became a stalwart of the Nazi community

The Masquerade

Opel became an early patron of the National Socialist Motor Corps, a rabid Nazi Party paramilitary auxiliary. Ironically, most of the members of the corps were not drivers, but Germans seeking to learn how to drive to increase national readiness. Opel employees were encouraged to maintain membership in the Motor Corps.

Furthermore, Opel cars and trucks were loaned without charge to the local storm trooper contingents stationed near company headquarters at Russelsheim, Germany. As brownshirt thugs went about their business of intimidation and extortion, they often came and went in vehicles bearing prominent Opel advertisements, proud automobile sponsor of the storm troopers.

The Opel company publication, Der Opel Geist, or The Opel Spirit, became just another propagandistic tool of Fuehrer worship, edited with the help of Nazi officials. Hitler was frequently given credit in the publication for Opel's achievements, and was frequently depicted in Der Opel Geist portraits as a fatherly or stately figure.

Hitler's voice regularly echoed through the cavernous Opel complex. His hate speeches and pep rallies were routinely piped into the factory premises to inspire the workers. Great swastika-bedecked company events were commonplace, as Nazi gauleiters, or regional party leaders, and other party officials spurred gathered employees to work hard for the Fuehrer and his Thousand-Year Reich. Opel contributed large cash donations to all the right Nazi Party activities. For example, the company gave local storm troopers 75,000 reichsmarks to construct the gauleiter's new office headquarters.

James D. Mooney Discusses Automotive Industry with Hitler

The Chancellor's office had sent Mr. Mooney a special windshield card for his car and as he left the hotel to go to the Field, he found that the card was at "open sesame" to every street leading to the field. In the process, Opel became more than a mere carmaker. It became a stalwart of the Nazi community.

Working hard and meeting exhausting production quotas were national duties. Employees who protested the intense working conditions, even if members of the Nazi Party, were sometimes visited by the Gestapo. SS officers worked as internal security throughout the plant. Order was kept.

Of course, GM's subsidiary vigorously joined the anti-Jewish movement required of leading businesses serving the Reich. Jewish employees and suppliers became verboten. Established dealers with Jewish blood were terminated, including one of the largest serving the Frankfurt region. Even long-time executives were discharged if Jewish descent was detected. Those lower-level managers with Jewish wives or parentage who remained with the company did so stealthily, hiding and denying their background.

To conceal American ownership and reinforce the masquerade that Opel stood as a purely Aryan enterprise, Sloan and Mooney, beginning in 1934, concocted the concept of a "Directorate," comprised of prominent German personalities, including several with Nazi Party membership. This created what GM officials variously termed a "camouflage" or "a false facade" of local management. But the decisions were made in America. GM as the sole stockholder controlled Opel's board and the corporate votes.

Among the decisions made in America beginning in about 1935 was the one transferring to Germany the technology to produce the modern gasoline additive tetraethyl lead, commonly called "ethyl," or leaded gasoline.

This allowed the Reich to boost octane that provided better automotive performance by eliminating disruptive engine pings and jolts. Better performance meant a faster and more mobile fighting force – just what the Reich would ultimately need for its swift and mobile Blitzkrieg.

As early as 1934, however, America's War Department was apprehensive about the transfer of such proprietary chemical processes. In late December 1934, as GM was considering building leaded gasoline plants for Hitler, DuPont Company board director Irénée du Pont wrote to Sloan: "Of course, we in the DuPont Company have always recognized the propriety and desirability of closely co-operating with the War Department of the United States. In any case, I know that word has gone to the War Department and have the impression that they would be adverse to disclosure of knowledge which would aid Germany in preparing that chemical." The profits were simply not worth it, argued du Pont.

Sloan had already bluntly told du Pont, "I do not agree with your reasoning to this question." Days later, Sloan appended that GM's commercial rights were "far more fundamental than the question of making a little money out of lead in Germany."

GM moved quickly – in conjunction with its close ally Standard Oil. Each company took a one-quarter share of the Reich ethyl operation, while I.G. Farben, the giant German chemical conglomerate, controlled the remaining 50 per cent.

The plants were built. The Americans supplied the technical know-how. Captured German records reviewed decades later by a U.S. Senate investigating committee found this wartime admission by the Nazis: "Without lead-tetraethyl, the present method of warfare would be unthinkable."

Years after the war, Nazi armaments chief Albert Speer told a congressional investigator that Germany could not have attempted its September 1939 Blitzkrieg of Poland without the performance-boosting additive.

GM was responsible for stunning growth in Germany's economy

Dwarfing The Competition

Within a few years of partnering with the Hitler regime, Opel began to dwarf all competition. By 1937, GM's subsidiary had grown to triple the size of Daimler-Benz and quadruple that of Ford's fledgling German operation, known as Ford-Werke. By the end of the 1930s, Opel was valued at $86.7 million, which in 21st-century dollars, translates into roughly $1.1 billion.

In the meantime, GM was responsible for stunning growth in Germany's economy. As most economists of the day knew, and as Sloan himself bragged, automobile manufacturing created thousands of factory jobs, hundreds of suppliers, numerous dealerships, widespread motorization and an attached oil industry.

Moreover, the growth of the highway network, from local roads to the Autobahn, spurred a construction boom that spawned thousands of additional jobs and necessitated hundreds of additional suppliers. Even GM's own sponsored expert historian, who decades later examined Hitler-era documentation, concluded: "The auto industry spearheaded the remarkable recovery of the German economy that boosted the popularity of the Nazi regime by virtually eliminating within a few years the mass unemployment that had idled a quarter of the workforce and contributed so importantly to Hitler's rise."

But Reich currency restrictions obstructed the outflow of cash for profits or even the purchase of raw materials to build trucks. GM in America circumvented those regulations through the overseas sales of German pencils, sewing machines, Christmas tree ornaments and virtually any other exports that would earn foreign currency internationally. Those sales proceeds were then exchanged for profits or raw materials through complicated bank transfers.

On The Homefront

Ironically, while GM's Opel was a deferential corporate citizen in Nazi Germany, going the extra mile to comply with Reich requirements and making no waves, Sloan helped foment unrest at home as part of the company's efforts to undermine the administration of president Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Sloan worked behind the scenes to defeat Roosevelt

For example, the GM president was one of the central behind-the-scenes founders of the American Liberty League, a racist, anti-Semitic, pro-big business group bent on rallying Southern votes against Roosevelt to defeat him in the 1936 election. The American Liberty League arose out of a series of private gatherings organized in July 1934 by Sloan, du Pont and other businessmen. Some of those meetings were even held at GM's office in New York.

The businessmen sought to create a well-financed, seemingly grassroots coalition that du Pont declared should "include all property owners, the American Legion and even the Ku Klux Klan." Sloan served on the American Liberty League's national advisory board and was one of a number of wealthy businessmen who each quietly donated $10,000 to its activities. The American Liberty League, which raised more money in 1935 than the National Democratic Party, in turn, funded an array of even more fanatical, racist and anti-Jewish groups.

One such group funded by the American Liberty League was the Southern Committee to Uphold the Constitution. With help from the du Pont family fortune, the Southern Committee circulated what it called "nigger pictures" of Eleanor Roosevelt with African-Americans. Sloan sent a $1,000 cheque directly to the Southern Committee after those pictures were distributed, according to congressional testimony.

Racist diatribes found in Southern Committee literature included an anti-union screed that complained:

"White women and white men will be forced into organizations with black African apes whom they will have to call 'brother' or lose their jobs." The Southern Committee also jointly organized protest marches with the American Nazi "Silver Shirts."

The American Liberty League also financed the Sentinels of the Republic. The Sentinels of the Republic, in turn, orchestrated incendiary, anti-Semitic letter-writing campaigns, and otherwise provoked a backlash against Roosevelt and what was sometimes derisively labelled his "Jew Deal."

True, the Sentinels of the Republic bore all the earmarks of a rabble-rousing extremist group. But behind it were some of the nation's most affluent and well-heeled, supplying the operating cash and direction. Among them: Sun Oil president Howard Pew, investment banker Alexander Lincoln, who served as the group's president, and the president of Pittsburgh Plate Glass, John Pitcairn. Sloan himself wrote a $1,000 check directly to the Sentinels of the Republic.

Adolf Hitler rides in a motorcade through the Brandenburg Gate to the opening ceremonies of the 11th Olympic Games in Berlin in August 1936. [USHMM, courtesy of National Archives and Records Administration, College Park]

Only after an April 1936 congressional investigation was Sloan's financial involvement in the Sentinels outed. Just days after the disclosure, Sloan issued a statement to an inquiring Jewish newspaper in Louisville, promising, "Under no circumstances will I further knowingly support the Sentinels of the Republic." He added, ambiguously: "I have no desire to enter into any questions involving religious or political questions."

PICKLE BARREL Grand

In 1936, the President threw down the gauntlet

Although Sloan backed away from further financing of the Sentinels, the GM chief continued to fund and fundraise for another anti-Roosevelt-agitation group, the National Association of Manufacturers. Founded in 1895 as a pro-business organization and still prominent more than 100 years later, NAM sowed anti-union and anti-New Deal discord among Americans in the 1930s through clandestinely owned and operated opinion-moulding arms.

Roosevelt openly acknowledged that Sloan, GM, the du Ponts and other corporate giants hated him for his reforms and his efforts to relieve Depression-era inequities. In his final 1936 campaign speech, the president threw down the gauntlet, shouting to an overflow Madison Square Garden crowd, "They are unanimous in their hate for me – and I welcome their hatred."

FDR was re-elected by a landslide

Roosevelt added that he wanted his first four years to be remembered as an administration where "the forces of selfishness and of lust for power met their match."

Fearing Roosevelt's possible re-election, several of Sloan's top executives at GM actually considered deliberately extending the financial woes of the Depression, presumably in retaliation against the entire nation. In the final days of the 1936 election campaign, several GM officials met with W.H. Swartz, a Lehman Brothers investment banker, according to a historian who studied the incident.

The GM officials apparently planned to stop investing in and expanding their company in the event of Roosevelt's expected victory. Swartz's Nov. 4, 1936, confidential memo about the GM meeting asserted, "Certain General Motors people also felt further capital expenditures could not be expected now, in view of Roosevelt's possible re-election." Based on their plans, Swartz predicted "a break in general business next year… mid-summer is the logical time to expect it," adding, "I would suggest that the rather intense political emotions of certain of these men may have coloured their thinking more than they themselves may have realized."

Despite the lush opposition funding by Sloan and other affluent anti-New Deal nemeses, Roosevelt was re-elected by a landslide.

While no capital slowdown was actually implemented by GM, Sloan did continue to battle the administration. The conflict was not subtle. Washington knew that Sloan and GM were powerful adversaries. For example, in 1937, when Sloan telephoned secretary of labour Francis Perkins to renege on a promise made to meet with labour strikers, Perkins lashed out bitterly at the GM chief.

Shocked at the reversal, Perkins shouted into the phone, "You are a scoundrel and a skunk, Mr. Sloan. You don't deserve to be counted among decent men. You'll go to hell when you die. Are you a grown man, Mr. Sloan? Or are you a neurotic adolescent? Which are you? If you're a grown man, stand up and be a man for once."

A flabbergasted Sloan protested, "You can't talk like that to me! You can't talk like that to me! I'm worth 70 million dollars and I made it all myself! You can't talk like that to me! I'm Alfred Sloan."

Shifting gears: From war profiteer to U.S. public transit conspirator

During the late 1930s, Hitler's persecution of Jews was building to a frenzy even as fears of a war escalated. Nevertheless, General Motors' German automotive subsidiary, Opel, remained a loyal corporate citizen of the Third Reich – content to obediently do the Nazi regime's bidding, and unstintingly supporting Hitler's program on many fronts. These included economic and employment recovery, anti-Jewish persecution, war preparedness and domestic propaganda. In return, Opel prospered.

Hitler was pleased – very pleased. In 1938, just months after the Nazis' annexation of Austria, James D. Mooney, head of GM's overseas operations, received the German Eagle with Cross, the highest medal Hitler awarded to foreign commercial collaborators and supporters.

On Nov. 9-10, 1938, shortly after Mooney's decoration, nationwide pogroms broke out in Germany against the Jews – Kristallnacht. The American public was finally shocked onto its heels by the night of officially orchestrated burning, looting and mob action against Jews.

President Roosevelt recalled America's ambassador, plunging German-American relations to their lowest point since Hitler assumed power. All things American came under special scrutiny in Germany.

By now, the truth about GM's ownership of the Opel car and truck operation was out in the open among Germans. Reich armament officials increasingly directed Opel's output, including mandating that nearly all vehicles be devoted to military use.

These are among the many findings of a multi-part JTA investigation that culled and re-examined thousands of pages of Nazi-era and New Deal-era documents that shed new light on GM's relationship with the Third Reich.

They reveal that even as GM and its president, Alfred P. Sloan, were helping mobilize the resurgent German military, they were undermining the New Deal of Franklin D. Roosevelt and undermining America's electric mass transit, and in doing so helped addict the United States to oil.

GM has declined comment for this story. The company has steadfastly denied for decades that it actively assisted the Nazi war effort or that it simultaneously subverted mass transit in the United States.

Laissez Faire, Sloan-style

In the months leading up to the feared 1939 invasion of Poland, Sloan, GM's president, defended his close collaboration with Hitler. Brushing off attacks for his partnership with a Nazi regime already notorious for filling concentration camps, taking over Austria and now threatening to install the "master race" across Europe, Sloan was stony and proud.

He stated, in a long April 1939 letter to an objecting stockholder, that in the interests of making a profit, GM shouldn't risk alienating its German hosts by intruding in Nazi affairs. "In other words, to put the proposition rather bluntly," Sloan said in the letter, "such matters should not be considered the business of the management of General Motors."

Indeed, in August of 1939, the world wondered when Hitler might invade Poland. During those days, Opel, under the direct day-to-day supervision of GM's senior executive, Cyrus Osborn, played its role in Germany's fast-paced military plans. The company was already manufacturing thousands of Blitz trucks that would become a mainstay of the Reich's upcoming Blitzkrieg.

The German military in early August urgently ordered Blitz-truck spare parts to be delivered to Reich bases near the Polish border. Days later in August, nearly 3,000 Opel employees, from factory workers to senior managers, were drafted into the Wehrmacht. Moreover, at about that time, GM's Osborn began evacuating most of the American employees and their families to the Netherlands. Soon, virtually all Opel civilian passenger car sales were eliminated in favour of military orders.

At 6 a.m. on Sept. 1, 1939, Germany launched its Blitzkrieg against Poland, with troops arriving in Blitz trucks manufactured by GM's Opel. The night before, Sloan reportedly told stockholders that GM was "too big" to be impeded by "petty international squabbles," according to a congressional investigation.

Shortly after war broke out in Europe, however, GM executives in Germany tried to distance the American company from its involvement in the brutal German war machine. The Opel board was restructured to ensure that GM executives maintained a controlling presence on the board of directors but continued invisibility in daily management. This was accomplished in part by bringing in GM's reliable Danish chief, Albin Madsen, and maintaining two Americans on that board.

By mid-1940, GM became a major war supplier for Allies

The company's 1939 annual report, released in April 1940, stated: "With full recognition of the responsibility that the manufacturing facilities of Adam Opel A.G. must now assume under a war regime, the Corporation has withdrawn the American personnel formerly in executive charge and has turned the administrative responsibilities over to German nationals."

However, GM was still masquerading. By the summer of 1940, a senior GM executive wrote a more honest assessment for internal circulation only. He explained that while "the management of Adam Opel A.G. is in the hands of German nationals," in point of fact, GM is still "actively represented by two American executives on the board of directors."

The construction and German-American balance of the many management entities created in the façade of control was constantly shifting during the Hitler years. But regardless of the number of members – German or American – on the various directing, managing or executive boards and committees, GM in the United States controlled all voting stock and could veto or permit all operations.

For all intents and purposes, though, once war began, Wehrmacht requirements and orders determined the specifics of military manufacturing at Opel. Like any nation at war, including the United States itself, the Reich alone determined what weapons would be made by its militarized factories. That said, it was GM's decision to remain operating in Germany, to continue to subject itself to Reich military orders, and answer the Reich's call for ever more lethal weapons.

As anticipated, Opel's Brandenburg facilities were conscripted and converted to an airplane-engine plant supplying the Luftwaffe's JU-88 bombers. Later, Opel's plants also built landmines and torpedo detonators. The factories and infrastructure that GM built during the 1930s were in fact finally used for their intended purpose – war. Opel-built trucks on the ground, Opel-powered bombers in the sky and Opel-detonated torpedoes in the seas brought terror to Europe.

Back in the United States, Sloan tried to obstruct FDR's war preparedness planning. The GM chief tried to dissuade GM executives with needed manufacturing and production experience from helping Washington's early mobilization plans. In one typical 1940 case, Sloan asked Danish-born William Knudson, who had ascended to become president of GM, not to leave the company and help Washington's war efforts. Sloan, who had become chairman of the company in 1937, warned his friend that the Roosevelt administration would make a "monkey out of you."

Knudson replied, "That isn't important, Mr. Sloan. I came to this country [from Denmark] with nothing. It has been good to me. Rightly or wrongly, I feel I must go."

Sloan retorted, "That's a quixotic way of looking at it."

By mid-1940, with or without Sloan's acquiescence, GM had been drafted by Washington to become a major war supplier for the Allies. Sloan had no choice but to comply, and GM and its employees would ultimately make enormously valuable contributions to the Allied war effort.

In June 1940, Sloan brought Mooney back to America to head up GM's key participation in America's crash program to prepare for war. He was installed as an assistant to the new GM president to take "full charge of all negotiations [with Washington] involving defense equipment "

Mooney's mere appointment sent shivers through the anti-Nazi boycott and protest committee, which well remembered his 1938 medal for what the Nazis had termed "service to the Reich." The Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League railed in a letter to Roosevelt: "How should we interpret the placing of a Hitler sympathizer and a Hitler servant (one must render service to the Reich to deserve such a medal) at the throttle of our defence program? Doesn't that appear suspiciously similar to the planting of Nazi sympathizers in key positions?"

Collusion But No Disloyalty

In June 1940, about the same time Mooney returned to America, Sloan wrote to a colleague, expressing disdain for FDR's democracy while grudgingly acknowledging his admiration for Hitler's fascist drive, even if that drive had become criminal.

"It seems clear that the Allies are outclassed on mechanical equipment," Sloan wrote, "and it is foolish to talk about modernizing their armies in times like these – they ought to have thought of that five years ago. There is no excuse for them not thinking of that except for the unintelligent, in fact, stupid, narrow-minded and selfish leadership which the democracies of the world are cursed with."

Sloan added a poignant contrast: "But when some other system develops stronger leadership, works hard and long, and intelligently and aggressively – which are good traits – and, superimposed upon that, develops the instinct of a racketeer, there is nothing for the democracies to do but fold up. And that is about what it looks as if they are going to do."

When at the end of 1940 the White House began to insist that GM break off relations with Latin American car dealers suspected of being pro-Nazi, Sloan defiantly refused. He lashed out at Washington, accusing it of protecting Communists at home while focusing on GM dealers in South America. "I have flatly declined to cancel dealers," Sloan wrote in April 1941 to Walter Carpenter, a GM board member and vice-president of du Pont.

Mooney only one mentioned by 1941 FBI investigation

Days later, on April 18, 1941, Carpenter retorted, "I think that General Motors has to consider this problem from three standpoints – first, from the commercial, second, the patriotic and, third, the public relations standpoint… We are definitely a part of the nation here, and our future is very definitely mingled with the future of this country. The country today seems to be pretty well committed to a policy opposite to Germany and Italy."

Carpenter continued with a blunt warning. "If we don't listen to the urgings of the State Department in this connection," he said, "it seems to me just a question of time… The effect of this will be to associate the General Motors with Nazi or Fascist propaganda against the interests of the United States… The effect on the General Motors Corporation might be a very serious matter and the feeling might last for years."

A few weeks later, in May 1941, a year and a half after World War II broke out, with newspapers and newsreels constantly transmitting the grim news that millions had been displaced, murdered, or enslaved by Nazi aggression and that London was decimated by the Blitz bombing campaign, Sloan, then in his mid-60s, told his closest executives during a Detroit briefing: "I am sure we all realize that this struggle that is going on through the world is really nothing more or less than a conflict between two opposing technocracies manifesting itself to the capitalization of economic resources and products and all that sort of thing."

He then continued in a rambling, incoherent fashion, trying to further justify the company's Nazi business dealings.

By now, Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle, whose portfolio included the investigation of Nazi fronts and sympathizers in Latin America, had had enough of Sloan and GM executives. Berle circulated a memo asserting "that certain officials of General Motors were sympathetic to or aligned with some pro-Axis groups… That this is [a] 'real Fifth Column' and is much more sinister than many other things which are going on at the present time." Berle called for an FBI investigation.

The FBI's probe of GM senior executives with links to Hitler found collusion with Germany by Mooney, but no evidence of any disloyalty to America. The Aug. 2, 1941, summary of the investigation clearly listed Sloan in the title of the report, but Mooney's was the only name mentioned in the investigative results. However, in a separate report to FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, the agent stated, "No derogatory information of any kind was developed with respect to Alfred Pritchard Sloan Jr."

Opel's Friendly Nazi Custodian

On Dec. 7, 1941, Pearl Harbor was bombed. The United States declared war on Japan. On Dec. 11, German diplomats in Washington called at the State Department to deliver Germany's declaration of war against America. All direct communications between GM and its Opel subsidiary in Germany were necessarily severed, although historians have always wondered about indirect links through Denmark, where GM operated a long-time subsidiary. Ranking GM men from Denmark were also in ranking positions both in Opel in Germany and GM in America.

After Germany declared war on America, all American corporate interests in Germany or under German control were systematically placed under the jurisdiction of a Reich-appointed "custodian" for enemy-owned property. In practice, the "custodian" was akin to a court-appointed receiver. Generally, the Reich custodian's duty was not to dismember the firm or Aryanize it, but to continue to run the enterprise as efficiently and profitably as possible, holding all assets and profits in escrow until matters would be resolved after the war. This generally meant reappointing members of the pre-existing management team, although these managers no longer reported directly to their American masters in the United States.

GM reaped financial benefits of relationship with Third Reich

In the case of Opel, Carl Luer, the longtime member of the Opel Supervisory Board, company president and Nazi Party stalwart, was appointed by the Reich to run Opel as custodian, but only some 11 months after America entered the war. In anticipation of the outbreak of hostilities, GM had appointed Luer to be president of Opel in late 1941, just before war broke out.

In other words, the existing GM-approved president of Opel continued to run Opel during America's war years. The company continued as a major German war profiteer, and GM knew its subsidiary was at the forefront of the Nazi war machine. An Aug. 27, 1944, a New York Times article detailed that Opel was the principal target of a 1,400-plane Royal Air Force bombing mission because its 35,000-worker plant was turning out crucial military transport and was known to be developing rocket technology.

In the wartime months and years that ensued, 1941-1945, GM built and operated some $900 million (US) worth (about $120 billion (US) in today's dollars) of defence manufacturing facilities for the Allies. Almost all of the company's undertakings were propped up by federal programs that guaranteed profit and "cost-plus" contracts, various subsidies, tax benefits and other incentives then available to defence contractors to produce goods for the war effort. Secretary of War Henry Stimson later explained that when a capitalist country wages war, "you have got to let business make money out of the process, or business won't work." Gen. Lucius Clay, who oversaw war matériel contracts, confessed, "I had to put into production schedule the largest procurement program the world had ever seen. Where would I find somebody to do that? I went to General Motors."

GM's Opel Blitz truck was a pivotal cog in Nazi Germany's military machine. It is shown here juxtaposed next to a Panzer tank, made by another manufacturer. [Collage by JTA]

GM also reaped the financial benefits of its relationship with the Third Reich. During the prewar Hitler years, GM entered its Opel proceeds under "reserves" instead of listing the profits as ordinary income. Then during America's war years, GM declared it had abandoned its Nazi subsidiary, and took a complete tax write-off under special legislation signed by Roosevelt in October 1942. The write-off of nearly $35 million created a tax reduction of "approximately $22.7 million" or about $285 billion in 21st-century money, according to an internal Opel document.

Post-war boom powered by U.S. auto industry

But Opel's friendly Nazi custodian, Carl Luer, kept on making profits for the company during those war years. Opel produced trucks, bomber engines, landmines, torpedo detonators and other war matériel, a significant amount of it by the sweat of thousands of prisoner labourers or other coerced workers; some of those workers were tortured if they did not meet expectations. Those profits and GM's 100 per cent stock ownership were preserved by the Reich custodian, even though GM and Opel ostensibly severed ties with each other after America entered the war.

During the Hitler years, many of those excess profits were used to acquire other companies and properties, only increasing Opel's assets in Germany. After the war, starting in 1948, GM began regaining control over Opel operations and eventually its monumental assets as well as blocked dividends. GM also collected some $33 million in "war reparations" because the Allies had bombed its German facilities.

After the defeat of Berlin, GM and its executives, including those who joined the government in Washington, then steered America toward its gargantuan postwar boom. That boom was in large measure powered by the constellation of direct and indirect economic benefits delivered by the U.S. automobile industry.

GM indicted in 1947 on two counts of conspiracy

The Transit Scam

Ironically, while GM was mobilizing the Third Reich, the company was also leading a criminal conspiracy to monopolistically undermine mass transit in dozens of American cities that would help addict the United States to oil.

The war in Europe had only been over for 16 months when on Oct. 2, 1946, a memo from the Department of Justice landed on the desk of J. Edgar Hoover, outlining the elements of the GM conspiracy.

At the centre of the conspiracy was National City Lines, an Enronesque company that suddenly arose in 1937, ostensibly run by five barely educated Minnesota bus drivers, the Fitzgerald brothers. Yet the Fitzgeralds miraculously marshalled millions of dollars to buy one failing trolley system after another. Soon, through a patchwork of subsidiaries, the brothers owned or controlled transit systems in more than 40 cities. Generally, when National City Lines acquired the system, the tracks were pulled from the street, the beloved electric trolleys were trashed or burned, and the whole system was replaced with more expensive, unpopular and environmentally hazardous motor buses that helped addict America to oil.

The Justice Department discovered that National City Lines was just a front company for General Motors, in league with Mack Truck, Phillips Petroleum, Standard Oil of California and Firestone Tires – all petroleum interests. The companies became the major preferred stockholders of National City Lines, but operated behind the scenes.

The scheme worked this way: the manufacturers purchased NCL preferred stock to acquire transit lines on condition that when the systems were acquired, the trolleys would be dismantled and replaced with motor buses.

That is exactly what happened. All the conspirators gained immensely when nonpolluting electric systems were replaced by oil-burners. Phillips and Standard sold oil products. Firestone sold the tires. GM and Mack divvied up the bus manufacturing and sales market according to an agreed-upon formula.

Transit systems in 16 states were converted, adversely affecting millions of Americans, who had to pay higher fares for lesser, more unpopular service. Dozens more cities were targeted in the $9.5-million scheme.

In April 1947, indictments alleging two counts of criminal conspiracy were handed down against General Motors, Mack Truck, Phillips Petroleum, Standard Oil of California and Firestone Tires, as well as against numerous key executives of the companies.

The defendants were found guilty on one of the two counts: conspiring to monopolize the bus business by creating a network of petroleum-based transit companies that were forbidden to use transportation or technology products other than those supplied by the defendants themselves. The jury found the defendants not guilty on the count alleging a conspiracy to actually control those transit systems. On April 1, 1949, the judge handed down his sentence: a $5,000 fine to each corporate defendant except Standard, which was fined $1,000. As for National City Lines, president E. Roy Fitzgerald and his co-conspirators at GM and the other companies, they too were fined.

Each was ordered to "forfeit and pay to the United States of America a fine in the amount of one dollar."

The cases were appealed – even the one-dollar penalties – all the way to the United States Supreme Court, which allowed the convictions to stand. The government filed a civil action against the same circle of companies trying to stop their continued conduct. But the government was unsuccessful. Undaunted, National City Lines and its many subsidiaries continued into the 1950s to acquire, convert and operate urban transit systems using evolved methods.

How will posterity remember General Motors' conduct?

The epilogue of the tumultuous saga of General Motors during the New Deal and Nazi era is still being written. That saga is the subject of a four-part JTA investigative series that concludes with this story. Thousands of pages of decades-old documents were scrutinized and re-examined to produce this series, which sheds new light on General Motors' relationship with the Third Reich and on the company's activities in America. They reveal that even as GM and its president, Alfred P. Sloan, were helping jump-start the resurgent German military, they were undermining the New Deal of Franklin D. Roosevelt and undermining America's electric mass transit, and in doing so, helped addict America to oil.

In 1974, a generation after World War II, the company's controversial history was resurrected by the U.S. Senate judiciary committee's subcommittee on antitrust and monopoly.

GM and Opel's collusion with the Nazis dominated the opening portion of the subcommittee's exhaustively documented study, which mainly focused on the company's conspiracy to monopolize scores of local mass transit systems in the United States.

The report's author, judiciary committee staff attorney Bradford Snell, used GM's collaboration with the Third Reich as a moral backdrop to help explain the automaker's plan in more than 40 cities, to subvert popular, clean-running electric public transit and convert it to petroleum-burning motor buses.

The Senate report, titled American Ground Transport, was released shortly after the Arab-imposed 1973 oil shock – and it accused GM of significantly contributing to the nation's petroleum woes through its mass-transit machinations.

GM had been convicted in 1949 of leading a secret corporate combine that funded a front company called National City Lines that systematically replaced electric trolleys with oil-guzzling motor buses across America. After Snell's report was presented, GM immediately went on the counterattack, denying Snell's charges about both its domestic conduct and its collusion with the Nazis, and demanding that the Senate judiciary committee cease circulating its own report. That, of course, did not happen.

But following the release of the Snell report, the automaker then created its own 88-page rebuttal report titled The Truth About American Ground Transport, whose entire first section, as it turns out, had nothing to do with American ground transport. It was headlined: "General Motors did not assist the Nazis in World War II."

GM has also consistently denied domestic wrongdoing.

Thus, GM's involvement with Nazi transportation in Germany juxtaposed with its conspiracy to convert electric mass transit at home became inextricably linked by virtue of the Senate's investigation, the company's own rebuttal and the compelling historical parallel between the company's conduct in the United States and its conduct in Germany.

GM further demanded that the Senate never permit its own report, American Ground Transport, to be distributed without GM's rebuttal attached. The Senate agreed – a rare move indeed. Snell, however, labelled the GM rebuttal a document calculated to mislead historians and the public.

Yet, another generation later, in the late 1990s, GM's collaboration with the Nazis was again resurrected when Nazi-era slave labourers threatened to sue GM and Ford for reparations. At the time, a GM spokesman told a reporter at the Washington Post that the company "did not assist the Nazis in any way during World War II." The effort to sue GM and Ford was unsuccessful, but both Ford and GM, concerned about the facts that might come to light, commissioned histories of their Nazi-related past.

In the case of Ford, the company issued its 2001 report, compiled by historian Simon Reich, plus the original underlying documentation, all of which was made available to the public without restriction. Ford immediately circulated CDs with the data to the media. Researchers and other interested parties may today view the actual documents and photocopy them. The Reich report concluded, among other things, that Ford-Werke, the company's German subsidiary, used slave labour from the Buchenwald concentration camp in 1944 and 1945, and functioned as an integral part of the German war machine. Ford officials in Detroit have publicly commented on their Nazi past, remained available for comment, apologized and generally helped all those seeking answers about its involvement with the Hitler regime.

As for GM, it commissioned eminent business historian Henry Ashby Turner Jr. in 1999 to conduct an internal investigation and report his findings. Turner, author of several favourably reviewed books, including German Big Business and the Rise of Hitler, was well known for, among other things, his insistence that big business did not make a pivotal contribution to the rise of Hitlerism.

GM, however, declined to release Turner's internal report or discuss the company's Nazi-era or New Deal-era history or archival holdings when originally contacted by this reporter. In February 2006, corporate spokeswoman Geri Lama twice refused to give this reporter the location of the company archive. In November of this year, Lama was again asked for an on-the-record response. She said she was referring the question to "staffers," but after more than a week, no reply had been received.

GM has maintained a special combative niche in the annals of American corporate history, achieving a reputation for suppressing books, obstructing access to archival records and frustrating critics from Ralph Nader to Bradford Snell. GM attorneys even fought efforts by Alfred P. Sloan himself to publish his own memoirs, although the autobiography was finally published in 1964 after a long court fight.

In July 2005, Turner published the book General Motors and the Nazis: The Struggle for Control of Opel, Europe's Biggest Carmaker (Yale University Press). The book features 158 chapter text pages of carefully detailed and footnoted information, plus notes, an index and a short appendix. Although the book has been reviewed, BookScan, which tracks about 70 per cent of retail book sales for the publishing industry, reported in late October that only 139 copies of the Turner book had been sold to the key outlets monitored by the service since the publication's release.

Wartime impact monumental

In his book, Turner, relying on his work as GM's historian, disputed many earlier findings about GM's complicity with the Nazis, concluding that charges that GM had collaborated with the Nazis even after the United States and Germany were at war "have proved groundless." Turner rejects "the assumption that the American corporation did business in the Third Reich by choice," asserting, "Such was not the case." Turner also states that GM had no option but to return wartime profits to its stockholders, since "the German firm prospered handsomely from Hitler's promotion of the automobile and from the remarkable recovery of the German economy."

However, Turner does state explicitly that "by the end of 1940, more than 10,000 employees at Opel's Russelsheim plant were engaged in producing parts for the Junkers bombers heavily used in raining death and destruction on London and other British cities during the air attacks of the Battle of Britain."

Turner also condemns GM for taking the Opel wartime dividends, which included profits made off slave labour. He writes, "But regardless of who [in the GM corporate structure] decided to claim that tainted money, its receipt rendered GM guilty, after the fact, of deriving profit from war production for the Third Reich made possible in part from the toil of unfree workers."

Aware that questions would arise about his relationship with GM, Turner's book states in its preface: "This book was not commissioned by General Motors. It was written after the documentation project was completed and without any financial support from GM. Its contents were seen by no one at GM prior to publication. It is therefore an independent undertaking by the author, who bears sole responsibility for its contents."

Turner did not respond to voice mail and e-mail messages seeking information about his sponsored GM history project, his subsequent book or other relevant topics.

The GM Opel documents assembled for the company's probe and Turner's commissioned examination were digitized on CD-ROMs and donated to Yale's Sterling Memorial Library, where the collection is categorized as being "open to the public." In point of fact, the obscure collection can only be viewed on a computer terminal. Print-outs or digital copies are not permitted without the written consent of GM attorneys.

Sterling reference librarians, who are willing to make the collection available, complained to this reporter as recently as October that they do not know how to access the digitized GM materials because of a complicated and arcane database never before encountered by them. One Sterling reference librarian answered a question about the document by declaring, "I have spoken to two reference librarians. No one knows anything about it [the GM Opel Collection], no one is in charge of it. No one knows how to access it."

Yale archivist Richard Szary, who supervised the accession of the collection, said that for the approximately half a decade that the documents have been on file, he knows of only "one or two" researchers other than this reporter who have had access to the papers. Szary, who was previously said to be the only Yale staffer who understood how to access the materials, facilitated this reporter's on-site access. He has since left Yale. By late November, however, in response to an inquiry by this reporter, a senior Sterling librarian said her staff would "figure out how to make it available" by reviewing technical details.

Simon Reich, who compiled Ford's Hitler-era documents, bristled at the whole idea. "Ford decided to take a very public, open and transparent route," he stated. "Any serious researcher can go into the [Henry Ford] archive, see the documents in paper form, and have them copied. Compare and contrast this with the fact that GM conducted a very private study and the original hard-copy documentation upon which the study was made has never been made available, and today cannot be copied without the GM legal department's permission."

Between the unpublished GM internal investigation, the restricted files at Yale and the little-known insights offered in Turner's book, the details of the company's involvement with the Hitler regime have remained below the radar.

Nonetheless, GM's impact in both the United States and the Third Reich was monumental.

On Jan. 15, 1953, company president Charlie Wilson was nominated to be secretary of defence, a job that would ultimately see him usher in the era of the interstate highway system. At Wilson's confirmation hearings, Senator Robert Hendrickson pointedly challenged the GM chief, asking whether he had a conflict of interest, considering his 40,000 shares of company stock and years of loyalty to the controversial Detroit firm. Bluntly asked if he could make a decision in the country's interest that was contrary to GM's interest, Wilson shot back with his famous comment, "I cannot conceive of one because for years, I thought what was good for our country was good for General Motors, and vice versa. The difference did not exist. Our company is too big."

Indeed, what GM accomplished in both America and Nazi Germany could not have been bigger.

GM 'responds' to the allegations

By BILL CARROLL
Detroit Jewish News

DETROIT — In response to allegations in a JTA investigative series by author Edwin Black that General Motors assisted Nazi Germany's war efforts before and during World War II, GM said that its German subsidiary resisted the Nazis before the war but was completely taken over by the genocidal regime in 1939.

GM told the Detroit Jewish News that that its executives in charge of its German subsidiary Adam Opel A.G. "strove to evade Nazi demands to convert the firm's main factory for production of dedicated war material. But this became moot shortly after Germany invaded Poland in 1939, and the Nazis took complete control of Opel, turning to forced labour to bolster its manufacturing industry."

GM added that in 2000, Opel made a $15-million contribution to the German multi-company Trust Fund Initiative to compensate these forced-labour workers and their survivors.

"During the 1941-1945 period of the war, when harsh state-sponsored sanctions against Jews and others grew into the horrors of the Holocaust, GM had no role in supporting the Nazi regime," said GM spokesperson Geri Lama. Lama is based in GM's Detroit Renaissance Center headquarters.

"In fact," she added, "GM became a key part of the American war effort, without which the Nazis might have remained in power for many years longer."

To help unearth the facts of the Nazi period, GM commissioned Yale University professor Henry Ashby Turner Jr. in 1998, and Adam Opel A.G. engaged Prof. Hans Pohl of Germany to conduct independent investigations of GM and Opel activities before and during World War II. They had unrestricted access to GM's internal records.

The professors completed their research in 2000 and Turner subsequently published a book based on his findings – without participation or financial assistance from GM. The book is General Motors and the Nazis: The Struggle for Control of Opel, Europe's Biggest Carmaker (Yale University Press; 2005). Turner's papers were turned over to Yale's Sterling Memorial Library in New Haven, Conn.

The book tells that, like all German companies, Adam Opel A.G. helped rebuild German industry during the 1930s. As Germany remilitarized in the mid-1930s, Opel sold trucks and other vehicles to the German armed forces, as did all other German vehicle manufacturers. The last GM executive departed Opel in early 1941, many months before the United States entered the war.

Refuting any inferences of anti-Semitism on GM's part, Lama cites the GM Foundation's long history of contributions to Jewish cultural and community organizations in the Detroit metro area. In the past five years, the GM Foundation has made donations totalling about $300,000 to such organizations as the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Detroit, the Jewish Community Center in West Bloomfield, the American Jewish Committee and the Shoah Visual History Foundation.

Says German subsidiary resisted the Nazis before the war but was taken over in 1939

In retrospect, concluded Turner and Pohl, Western governments, corporations, churches and other institutions should have been more alarmed as the economic revival of Germany came under the control of the Nazis and was transformed into an engine of warfare and genocide.

"Like all who lived through this dark period, GM is resolved to do all in its power as a corporation to make certain this never happens again," said Lama.

Liora Norwich: Canadian for coexistence

By JENNY HAZAN

It wasn't until Torontonian Liora Norwich, 25, came to Israel to research her MA thesis during the war with Lebanon in July that she really began to consider making aliyah.

The former student of comparative politics at the London School of Economics (LSE) – who graduated at the top of her class for her research on Israeli Arab identity issues – had been to Israel several times before with family and on various youth programs. But it wasn't until this past summer that opportunity knocked – or so she thought.

Norwich was offered a job with a sub-contractor offering strategic support to non-governmental organizations (NGOs).

"I had done everything I could outside of Israel, and I realized that it was time to move here, so that I could actually do long-term coexistence work with the communities I wanted to work with," she explains. "I have come for very political reasons.

"I don't believe in Zionism in and of itself – as in building the land of Israel for the Jews – because it's not viable. We've got to build the land of Israel for the inhabitants that are here," says Norwich, who officially immigrated to Tel Aviv on Sept. 5.

> She dreams of launching a large-scale 'social justice' project

"If it's going to be a Jewish state, it's got to be a Jewish state living by the rules of Judaism, and it's pretty far from that right now. The state has strayed from its respect for human rights and equality. It's a question of social justice, which is what Judaism is all about," says Norwich, who graduated from United Synagogue Day Schools and Northern Secondary School in Toronto.

"I don't want to put my stamp of approval on the state yet, because I don't like so many things that the state is doing, that I think we could fix. But the external conflict is not intractable and the internal troubles aren't either. As Jews, we have done so much in the last 50 years. We have done so much wrong, but we have done so much right. Now is the time to move two steps forward."

Norwich dreams of launching a large-scale "social justice" project involving the construction of a nation-wide network of coexistence educational centres for Arab and Jewish youth.

"I know of many programs that are very small-scale, but I feel that what is needed is a big network of programs to be launched simultaneously, so that each can support the other. There is so much that can be done to create a much stronger atmosphere and much healthier citizens of the state of Israel.

"I think this kind of work is the key to eventually reaching across the Green Line, too," she adds. "Israel's relationship with the Arab Israeli community could be instrumental to ending the conflict."

Norwich got her first taste of coexistence work in her undergraduate degree in peace and conflict studies at University of Toronto. "I was already interested in the Arab-Israeli conflict, but it got me interested in how conflict resolution systems work," she explains. "The program really straddled the divide between focusing on conflict and how conflict erupts, and how peacebuilding happens."

Just after she completed her undergraduate degree in June 2004, Norwich headed to Israel, where she spent eight months interning at the Jerusalem Post and B'Tselem (The Israeli Information Centre for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories), through the Jewish Agency's Tnuat Aliyah Professional Internship program.

"I really didn't know what I was in for," admits Norwich, who lived at the Beit Canada Absorption Center in Jerusalem for the duration of the internships. "Both of them thought they were more than half time, so I ended up working around the clock for them," she says. "But they were both great experiences, if by the end of it I was a little burned out from all the free work."

Still, she pursued a third internship with Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, which then had a satellite office in Israel. For the final three months of her stay, Norwich designed and implemented a six-week program bringing together children from the Arab and Jewish community centres in Ramle.

"In some ways it was more exhausting than the other internships put together," Norwich says. "But it was so interesting for me to see how the two groups got along. It was an extremely rewarding experience."

Norwich says that leaving Israel after the internships was very difficult for her. "I was settled in, and I really didn't want to leave." But when she heard that she had been admitted to LSE, she knew she had to go.

Her experience in Ramle stuck with her during the year that she worked on her degree, and it was this work that eventually inspired Norwich to write her MA thesis on internal Arab-Israeli dynamics. The fallout of the events of October 2000 had a special impact on her, when, during the intifadah, Israeli police killed 13 Palestinian demonstrators in Israel's north.

Norwich returned to Israel in July to research her thesis. For three weeks, she ran around the country interviewing the families of the demonstrators, Israeli police and third-party organizations that had been stationed there.

"I tried to look at how the event had affected the identity of the Arab citizens in Israel, since I think their identity is really changing, and I think it's overlooked in the literature because of the bigger conflict happening over the Green Line," she says. "In a lot of ways, Israel is a much better place to grow up than a lot of places in the Middle East. But it's hard on its Arab citizens. It's also a push-pull because they want to be here: they want to be a part of the country, but they know that they are seen as outsiders."

While she was running around, she was offered the job with the sub-contractor, where she could apply her research to fundraising for NGOs.

Aliyah one of the toughest things she has ever done

Liora Norwich

So, after returning to London to write and submit her thesis, Norwich arranged her aliyah through the shaliach in London, promptly returned to Israel as a new immigrant and started working in September.

Alas, like most aliyah stories, hers didn't turn out quite as planned. The intended job fell through, and instead she found herself unemployed and living in Tel Aviv.

"Losing this job was really hard for me," she says. "I know so many fabulously bright, competent people who are really struggling for jobs here. So, I'm a little down on the process."

But all is not lost. While she continues to search for the perfect job, Norwich enrolled in full-time, intensive Hebrew classes at Ulpan Gordon in Tel Aviv.

"This has been a real experience," she says, adding that she hasn't learned Hebrew since she was in day school. "All of a sudden, I'm hearing Hebrew in everyday language, and it's something very interesting to me."

When she's not studying, Norwich fills her time volunteering. Her favourite organization is Rabbis for Human Rights, and she goes olive picking in the northern West Bank with group members every Friday morning. "We help Palestinian farmers pick their fields."

She explains that it's less about increasing the farmers' yields than it is about ensuring that they can gain access to their land. "It's about making an occupation – which I am not scared to call it – functional," she says. "It's not a long-term solution, but it's one way of making things a little bit better. There are things that can be done – every week, every day – and I feel this is one of the more positive things to do."

Although she feels she is making a positive contribution to Israel by being here, she admits that making aliyah is one of the toughest things she has ever done.

"What I struggle with most is a psychological thing," she says. "You are told when you come here that you are building a life, and in those words, it's really psychologically heavy. But it doesn't happen like that. Almost nothing has just snapped into place, and when things aren't going well, my inclination is to panic. I have to constantly remind myself to calm down and enjoy this adventure that I have chosen to take."

At the same time, she has been pleasantly surprised by some aspects of Israeli culture. "Israel is a really dynamic place. There is always something happening here: whether it's a random rally that you didn't know about, or someone decided to plan an event on Shenkin Street where everybody stands around and hugs everybody else at 4 p.m., or you are sitting on the beach and some guy who is completely naked and silver-spray-painted with wings stops by to tell you that 'you just have to find your inner light.'

"That's the best part about Israel – that I can't predict my day and that almost every day, something totally unexpected happens," she says. "Whereas I know that if I'm in Toronto, I can spend the whole day doing exactly what I planned to do."

Norwich says that actually being in Israel has made her more moderate. "It's very easy to sit back in Canada and say everything the state is doing is wrong. Actually living and breathing Israel has made me less extreme and less dogmatic, and has given me a much more balanced viewpoint."

German Jews inaugurate new shul in Munich

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

MUNICH — Eight-year-old Sarah was perched on a trash can, with her father, Alois, holding her steady. Before them was a throng of Jews, parading somewhat solemnly down the rain-dampened street.

"They're carrying Torahs to the new synagogue," Alois explained as the crowd passed, chupahs raised high, following a young boy with a lantern that contained a spark of the eternal flame.

That spark soon would light the lamp in a new synagogue and community centre in the heart of Munich.

The Nov. 9 ceremony, attended by Jewish and political leaders and broadcast live on television, marked another liberation for the Jewish community – this time from its postwar angst, embodied by its old community centre, which was hidden in a courtyard barred by gates.

The new centre, a rectangular construction of natural stone topped with a glass box hung with nets of bronze, is open for all to see and visit. The inauguration event competed for Germans' attention with the 17th anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall and the 68th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Nazi pogrom that heralded the end of centuries of Jewish life in Germany.

Inside the sanctuary, some 1,000 people welcomed the Torah scrolls. As in a sukkah, the sky's changing moods played out through the lofty glass structure. Only the rain stayed outside.

Inauguration event was on the 68th anniversary of Kristallnacht

Ohel Jakob, or Tent of Jacob, is a fitting name for the structure designed by architects Rena Wandel-Hoefer and Wolfgang Lorch. It bears the same name as a Munich synagogue burned on Kristallnacht.

As long as she lives, she'll never forget that day, Charlotte Knobloch, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany and of the Munich Jewish community, said in inaugurating the new centre.

"I was six years old… holding my father's hand," looking at the blackened synagogues and shattered windows of Jewish shops, she said. "I did not understand at all. But I also understood everything," said Knobloch, who later went into hiding with a Catholic family.

Now, there is a new Nov. 9 to remember.

"A 68-year circle has closed," she said.

A child handed Knobloch the key to the new synagogue, and she urged Munich's non-Jews to "see this as their place, too, and visit it. Discuss, laugh and argue with us."

The day's celebration would not eclipse remembrance, nor would it distract from watchfulness, German President Horst Koehler said.

New centre is 'a great step toward normalization'

"It's painful – painful that right-wing extremists planned an attack on the day of the laying of the cornerstone here three years ago," he said, "painful that neo-Nazis wanted to hold a march nearby" on the day of the opening.

But Koehler applauded young Germans for asking tough questions about the past. He also said he rejoiced in the growth of Jewish communities in Germany: Germany has the fastest-growing Jewish community in Europe, with 120,000 members, up from 30,000 in 1990.

Germany the fastest-growing Jewish community in Europe

Rabbi Steven Langnas, Munich's Orthodox rabbi, will preside over the synagogue, and he said he hoped it would become a spiritual centre and gathering place for the community. He asked Yisroel Diskin, Munich's Chabad rabbi, to light the eternal lamp with the spark carried from the street procession.

"There are still those around the world who would deny our flame, who deny our history," said Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress. "We must maintain our vigilance."

And yet to be a Jew in Germany today, "you don't have to hide. You can be proud," said Yisrael Meir Lau, a Polish-born Holocaust survivor and former Israeli chief Ashkenazi rabbi.

Lau described his feelings as he helped carry the Torah scrolls through the streets.

"We had for many years to hide the Torah, and today is a demonstration for the survival of Jewish identity, for Jewish immortality," he said. "People are standing outside in their windows, watching this parade of the Jewish renaissance."

But Rabbi Israel Singer, chairman of the WJC's policy council, described the new synagogue as a "test." The proof, he said, will be if the Jewish community continues to grow and thrive in Germany, if it can integrate its new Russian-speaking majority and educate a new generation.

With the mezuzahs up, the eternal flame lit and the Torahs stowed in their new ark, celebrants retired to the new ballroom for food and drink.

"I'm happy that this centre is here," said Irene Buchhalter, 82, a Holocaust survivor from Lemberg.

But she wasn't sure it was a good idea to mix with non-Jews. The older generation still has fears, she said.

When she was young, it didn't help if you fit in, and "they killed us anyway.

"We're living here like in a ghetto. But the second generation is different," she said.

A group of students congregated at the exit, gathering their coats and making plans. For them, the night was still young.

The new centre is "a great step toward normalization," said Ruth Chmiel, 21, a student born in Munich.

"Everyone can see this, just like the churches."

But how normal can Jewish life be in Germany when a new synagogue has to be guarded by sharpshooters? And when there's a growing Jewish community on one hand and signs of growing right-wing extremism on the other?

Actually, it's that contrast itself that is normal. Not just Nov. 9, but on any day.

"That's life," Langnas said between shaking hands and saying l'chaim. "Positive and negative, living and dying, joy and sadness, all mixed up with one another. And that's what we had today."

Leader of German Jewry sees a decades-old dream fulfilled

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

MUNICH — The new head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany now has more time to bring her dreams to fruition.

Elected in June to serve out the term of Paul Spiegel, who died last spring, Charlotte Knobloch was unanimously confirmed Nov. 19 for a full four-year term. The council's 120 delegates met in Dusseldorf, Spiegel's former hometown, in his memory.

Like her predecessors Spiegel and the late Ignatz Bubis, Knobloch is a Holocaust survivor. As a former hidden child, she represents a bridge to the next generation of Jewish leaders, those who grew up after World War II.

Charlotte Knobloch

She thus carries hopes for the future together with sombre remembrance of the past. Those sentiments sometimes seem to clash: while Knobloch saw a dream come true with the opening of a new Jewish community centre in Munich on Nov. 9 – the 68th anniversary of the Kristallnacht pogrom that she witnessed as a child – she also has spoken out against rising right-wing extremism in Germany.

Knobloch remembers when Jews in Germany never thought they'd see a new synagogue open in the heart of Munich. Of the handful of German Jews and tens of thousands of displaced eastern European Jews stranded in Germany after the Holocaust, most wanted out.

"After 1945, none of us wanted to stay in Germany. Everyone wanted to leave, especially the young ones," Knobloch recently said in an interview with JTA. "Everyone who stayed has their story. They weren't staying voluntarily."

Knobloch's story begins with her birth in 1932. Her mother, Margarethe, had converted to Judaism to marry Fritz Neuland, an attorney and politician, but she left the family in 1936 as a result of the pressure of the Nazis' racial policy.

Young Charlotte was sent to live with her grandmother, Albertine Neuland, who was later deported.

Desperate to save his daughter, Fritz Neuland brought 10-year-old Charlotte to Kreszentia "Zenzi" Hummel, a Catholic woman who had worked as a maid for a relative of his. Charlotte went by the name Lotte Hummel and lived as Zenzi's illegitimate daughter until the war was over.

A devout Catholic, Zenzi "lived in her own world," Knobloch recalls. "She always rejected any form of recognition" after the war.

Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial, "wrote 10 times to her" hoping to recognize Zenzi's heroism, but in vain.

"She said she already had been rewarded. The family had a reason why they took this risk," Knobloch says. "Their two sons were soldiers in the war, and they hoped that if they did a good deed, their sons would come back alive. And they did come back."

Knobloch's father survived the war, and Charlotte later went to work in his law office. She also followed him as leader of the official body of Munich's Jewish community, which he had co-founded.

She later became a vice-president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany before becoming president this summer. She also heads the European Jewish Congress and is a vice-president of the World Jewish Congress.

Knobloch married Samuel Knobloch when she was 18. They have three children and three grandchildren, two of whom currently serve in the Israeli army.

"Mrs. Knobloch is a world class Jewish leader in every one of the endeavours she undertakes," said Rabbi Israel Singer, chair of the World Jewish Congress policy council. "She stands between two generations, both as a Holocaust survivor and as a person who is building for the next millennium in Jewish life. She is a woman filled with contradictions and positive creativity."

Ever watchful, Knobloch is also ever the optimist

Knobloch has not always drawn applause from other Jewish leaders. She recently opposed Germany's decision to send peacekeeping troops to Lebanon, bending only after Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert came out in favour.

And her recent statements comparing today's right-wing extremism to the situation in 1933, when the Nazis assumed power, were contradicted publicly by Central Council vice-presidents Salomon Korn and Dieter Graumann, who expressed concern in more measured tones.

An increase in right-wing extremist incidents over last year

Crime statistics show an increase in right-wing extremist incidents over last year. Recently, pupils in a former east German town forced a schoolmate to wear a sign reading, "I am the biggest pig of all because I hang around with Jews."

During Israel's war with Lebanon this summer, a demonstrator in Munich carried a sign that read, "Jews are murderers of children."

Knobloch defended her approach.

"I was not expressing a personal fear, but I'm responsible for 120,000 registered Jewish citizens of this country, and I have seen that just raising a finger in warning is not enough," she says. "If I have to see how a young person is paraded with a sign, like Jews were forced to do [during the Nazi period], then it is not enough to raise one's finger. One has to use very drastic words, words that I hope will also have a lasting effect."

Right-wing crimes are not the only problem: neo-Nazis have used elections to gain a foothold in a handful of state parliaments in Germany.

"I sometimes have the feeling that they come and go. But the intensity of the situation today has nothing to do with the jackboots and bomber jackets" of the old Nazis, Knobloch says. "It's more subtle. It has to do with the influencing of young people, of influencing unhappy people, people who are not coming to terms with the state of the economy."

It may be a passing situation, she says, "but one has to pay enough attention so it does not become a permanent situation."

Ever watchful, Knobloch also is ever the optimist. One of her chief hopes was to see Jewish life here flourish, and to some extent it has, especially since Jews from the former Soviet Union began to arrive after 1990.

Wishes to bring certain normalcy back to Jewish life

Their integration has been a challenge, but the quadrupling of the Jewish population has led to the building of new synagogues, the opening of Jewish schools and competition among Orthodox, Conservative and Reform institutions.

One might call Knobloch a seer: some 20 years ago, when she first entered Jewish public life, she asked herself why no one had ever proposed a new main synagogue in Munich.

She decided it was her job to do that, went to city authorities and suggested that they lay a cornerstone on the 50th anniversary of Kristallnacht in 1988.

"They were very polite and nice and friendly, but there was little understanding for my idea. The notion of a 'living Jewry' was not a theme at the time," she says. "I naturally did not give up. I pursued it, and the result is that now, in 2006, a synagogue and community centre and museum are opening here. It's important that Jewish life can show itself openly."

Jews and non-Jews helped raise money for the $51-million project – some gave millions, but many gave $5 or $10, Knobloch says. The centre reportedly already has the nickname "Charlottenburg."

"I hope that we in Munich will give a signal to all other institutions working hard to bring a certain normalcy back to Jewish life," Knobloch says, "so that Jews can feel the acceptance of the non-Jewish society, and not only on paper."

Israel wants larger share of Claims Conference funds

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — An Israeli coalition including the Jewish Agency for Israel, Israeli Holocaust survivor organizations and the Knesset's pensioner affairs minister is calling on the Claims Conference to give Israel a larger share of Holocaust restitution funds and more control over distribution decisions.

Leaders of the coalition announced last month that they were launching a unified effort to get the Claims Conference to recognize the centrality of Israel in its distribution of hundreds of millions of dollars in unclaimed Holocaust-era assets. The new public relations campaign was prompted by the Claims Conference's "paltry" response to emergency aid requests from Israel during its summertime war in Lebanon, Jewish Agency chairman Zeev Bielski said.

"Only one agency did not respond when I asked for one-time emergency disbursements during the war in Lebanon this summer: the Claims Conference," Bielski charged. The conference's response arrived only after the war, he said, and it was "too little and too late."

The Claims Conference denied aid requests from the Jewish Agency for hospitals and protected rooms in northern Israel, Agency spokesperson Yarden Vitikay said, committing only $100,000 (all figures US) after the war to a program for terror victims – this, from what is perhaps the richest Jewish organization in the world. By comparison, the United Jewish Communities umbrella group raised $320 million for northern Israel from its member federations.

> Attempting to break control over hundreds of millions of dollars

Members of the Israeli coalition, including Yad Vashem chairman Avner Shalev, now are demanding that the Claims Conference boost Israeli representation on its board, transfer most of its operations to Israel and increase the speed and quantity of disbursements to Israeli Holocaust survivors.

This Israeli campaign represents the latest in a long string of efforts to break the Claims Conference's virtual monopoly of control over hundreds of millions of dollars in Holocaust restitution disbursements. In recent years, various survivor groups, advocates, community leaders and Israeli officials have tried to wrest some control over the restitution process from the conference's board, with only limited success.

In response to last month's announcement, Claims Conference communications director Hillary Kessler-Godin issued a statement saying, "Issues concerning governance or structure, as well as proposed changes to policy, can be brought to the board of directors of the organization, which meets in July every year."

Kessler-Godin said the conference "has been outstandingly successful in negotiating for Holocaust-era compensation on behalf of Holocaust survivors worldwide in recovering property, in assisting Nazi victims and in educating future generations about the lessons of the Shoah."

The Claims Conference has allocated emergency payments of $3.2 million to 13,000 needy Nazi victims in northern Israel, Kessler-Godin said. These are direct payments to assist victims of Nazism affected by the war. The group also recently held information sessions for Nazi victims in Israel's north concerning their eligibility for payments and assistance from various sources of Holocaust compensation and restitution.

'In another 15 years, there won't be Holocaust survivors'

In addition, the Claims Conference has just allocated $1.7 million to build protected rooms in sheltered housing complexes primarily housing victims of Nazism. The Claims Conference is also preparing future projects to assist hospitals in border areas, Kessler-Godin said.

Under agreements dating back to its formation in 1951, the New York-based Claims Conference – formally, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany – is the lead organization charged with recovering Jewish war-era assets from Germany, and its successor organization has become the legal heir of unclaimed Jewish properties from East Germany.

The value of the assets recovered so far from the former East Germany numbers in the billions of dollars. Every year, the Claims Conference distributes approximately $90 million of that money to organizations of its choice according to a formula whereby 80 per cent goes to groups that provide services to survivors and 20 percent goes to Holocaust education and documentation projects.

Projects range from soup kitchens in Russia run by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee to a Tel Aviv-based Yiddish theatre troupe that performs for survivors.

In the past, critics such as the National Association of Jewish Child Holocaust Survivors' Leo Rechter and the World Jewish Congress' former executive vice- president, Elan Steinberg, questioned why grants were going to birthright israel, Yiddish theatre and the installation of sprinkler systems in Israeli nursing homes, rather than to needy survivors.

'Our struggle is over centrality of State of Israel'

This time, the Israeli critics – including groups that are on the Claims Conference's board – are focusing not on the types of programs that receive funding, but on the geographic distribution of funds and the composition and location of the body that makes funding decisions.

The Israelis say that they, rather than a multinational board dominated by American Jews, should decide how their share of the money is spent.

"We are a nation of victims of the Holocaust," said Noah Flug, chairman of the Center of Survivor Organizations in Israel. "Today we have no say. We don't even have autonomy in deciding how the money is distributed. Neither Israelis nor survivors are making these decisions. Things are decided for us, and without us."

Israeli Minister for Pensioner Affairs Rafi Eitan – the erstwhile Mossad field officer who captured Nazi fugitive Adolf Eichmann – said the Claims Conference has failed survivors.

Eitan visited particularly harsh criticism on the pace of disbursements, saying money is being hoarded by the Claims Conference rather than being released to survivors while they're still alive.

"In another 15 years, there won't be Holocaust survivors around anymore," Eitan said. "The Claims Conference works according to its own rules, but the money belongs only to the Holocaust survivors."

The Claims Conference's spokesperson declined to respond to specific charges.

Eitan said the fulcrum of the problem lies in the composition of the Claims Conference's board, which has not changed to keep up with the changing Jewish world. Aside from the addition of three board members, two of them survivor groups added in 1988, there have been no significant changes in the composition of the Claims Conference's board in the 55 years since it was created. Eitan's critiques echoed those described by critics in a special JTA investigative series in 2004.

The Israelis say such distortions should be rectified – by giving Israel more control.

"I don't know if they know it, but the centre of the Jewish world is here in Zion," Bielski told reporters at a press conference last month at the Jewish Agency's headquarters in Jerusalem. "We will continue this campaign until they give us our rightful seats at the table. This is our historic responsibility.

"Our struggle today is over the centrality of the State of Israel," Bielski said.

Since it split from the Soviet Union in 1991, Azerbaijan – where about three out of four people are Shiites – has developed a rich friendship with Israel.

The relationship was born in 1992 when Israel supported Azerbaijan against Armenia in the Karabakh War, a territorial conflict following the break-up of the Soviet Union. The war killed an estimated 20,000, and Armenia currently occupies about 20 per cent of Azerbaijan's territories.

Israel has since continued to provide intelligence, security and military training to Azerbaijan, as part of an Israel-Turkey-Azerbaijan alliance roughly pitted against an Armenia-Russia-Iran axis.

The Jews and the Shiites also do much business. Israel's Backcell is the second-largest cellphone operator in the country of eight million and just one of many Israeli businesses doing brisk trade in the nation at the foot of the Caucasus. The recent opening of the BTC pipeline allows Azerbaijani oil to flow from the Caspian Sea to the Mediterranean, a supply that helps secure Israel's vulnerable energy supply from political interruption.

The relationship was born in 1992

Although its citizens are Muslim, Azerbaijan might be the most secular Muslim country, likely a result of 70 years of Soviet atheism. The main streets of Baku, the capital and the largest city of Azerbaijan, are full of women sporting trendy skin-tight western fashions and nowhere can a veil or any other religious clothing be seen. Those who climb atop Baku's famous ancient Maiden Tower might be hard-pressed to find more than a couple of minarets on the skyline.

On a recent visit to the country, I found myself at a picnic table overlooking the Caspian discussing Azerbaijan's politics with a half-dozen Azerbaijani professionals. The men proceeded with their customary lunchtime ritual – unscrewing a large bottle of Azeri vodka, which was followed by the first of countless salutary toasts.

We drank to Canada and Phil Esposito's performance in the 1972 Canada-Russia hockey series. We feasted on a sumptuous spread of fresh fruits, fried sturgeon and fatty mutton kebab.

While such Azerbaijanis consider themselves solid members of the Muslim brotherhood of nations, they are thoroughly committed to having a fully western state.

None seem tempted by the overtures of their co-religionists in neighbouring Iran, a country that has long wooed Azerbaijan into the orthodox fold. Many Azerbaijanis remain mistrustful of Iran, a country that has forbidden its own Azeri minority to attend school in their own language, which is similar to Turkish. Iranian support for Armenia during the Karabakh War was also seen as a stinging insult.

Iran continues to attempt to dissuade Azerbaijan from the Israeli orbit. In August 2004, Iran offered Azerbaijan major concessions in a dispute over oil rights. In return, it requested that Azerbaijan cut military ties with Israel.

Iran's efforts to cultivate Azerbaijan's bitter rival, Armenia, have been more successful. In 2002, the U.S. State Department accused Armenia of helping Iran develop its nuclear program.

Azerbaijan's link with its Jewish community goes beyond modern diplomatic necessity. Just 25 kilometres from the seaside picnic table where we raised too many glasses sits Krasnaya Sloboda, home to an estimated 4,000 Mountain Jews, or Tats as they're known. The history of the Jewish hill town is debated, but it's believed to have sprung up more than 15 centuries ago. Iranian Jews settled there in the 17th century.

The area was once a stronghold in the Khazar Empire, the only Jewish state in history outside of Israel. The Khazars originated when a nomadic tribal leader named Khagan converted to Judaism in order to avoid having to choose between the Byzantine Greek Christians in the southwest and the Kievan Rus barbarians in the north.

Country rich in precious petroleum resources

In a recent visit to the Mountain Jews of Krasnaya Sloboda, bestselling Jewish American author Gary Shteyngart, whose roots are in the region, described "the incredible prosperity of the place." Meanwhile, French historian Marek Halter's historical novel The Winds of the Khazars offers spellbinding historical conjecture about the roots of the Jewish past in the region.

Some religious historians suggest that Zoroastrianism inspired many key elements of Judaism, which is one of the world's first monotheistic faiths. Zoroastrianism originated in Azerbaijan and was inspired by the fires that shoot from the soil in the country, a phenomena that the Zoroastrians consider a divine symbol.

Another connection between the Azeris and Jews was explored in one of last year's hottest titles. Tom Reiss' The Orientalist explores the rich traditions of Jewish-Azeri relations through the tale of Baku novelist Lev Nussinbaum, who became a literary hero in Azerbaijan in the 1930s.

Israel has an embassy in Azerbaijan (although Canada does not) and the two countries frequently make friendship and cooperation deals. Yet Azerbaijan also lines up with other Muslim countries to speak up for the Palestinians.

The complex diplomatic web might seem impossible to other nations, but Azerbaijan has faced such demands for centuries. This country at the crossroads of Asia and Europe has seen just about every civilization pass through. Even Vikings hung their horned helmets in Azerbaijan, as proven by Gobustan's ancient petroglyphs.

Israel has an embassy in Azerbaijan although Canada does not

The popular petroglyphs, perhaps only eclipsed as a tourist site by the nearby and highly bizarre mud volcanoes, depicts ancient drawings scratched into rock by one-time Viking residents.

Some say that the Vikings have returned in the form of rowdy British Petroleum oil workers, whose pubs are now a fixture in Baku, a booming yet picturesque hill city full of winding streets, mansions, discos, museums and leafy parks.

Azerbaijan's geography and precious petroleum resources has led it to suffer much political manipulation, as regional superpowers such as Iran and Russia have played diplomatic chess in the oil-rich region.

Even Hitler hungered for control of the country. In a famous newsreel, Hitler is shown eating from a cake baked in the shape of the country, lustily swallowing the piece marked Baku. Alas, the Nazis would never gain control of the area, to the delight of the many Jews who moved there to flee the Holocaust.

Modern offshore oil extraction has allowed one million tonnes of crude to be sucked daily from the Caspian, sent north to Tbilisi, Georgia, and finally to tankers on the Mediterranean at Ceyhan, Turkey, where the crude is loaded on tankers and shipped to Israel and other countries beyond.

Baku is home to 11,000 of country's 16,000 Jews

The pipeline is fast turning Azerbaijan into a Kuwait of the Caspian, as an estimated $150 billion will flow to Azerbaijan over the next two decades, big money to a country where many war refugees have been living in train cars and pensioners exist on paltry pensions of $30 (US) a month.

The BTC is good news for Israel, which like most of Europe, has faced serious energy supply vulnerabilities. In May, visiting Israeli Knesset member Joseph Shagal even suggested that the BTC be extended from Turkey to Ashkelon City in Israel. The fuel that courses through the giant underground vein should offer a chance for Israel to survive any politically inspired oil blockade

After chatting about the complex politics at the Caspian-side picnic, our van headed south along the main highway to Baku, home to 11,000 of the country's 16,000 Jews. We passed Five Finger Mountain. Myth has it that it's the hand of a hero who conquered a monster that had blocked the water supply. Our driver stopped at a mosque to give alms for the needy, undoubtedly asking Allah for a bit of safety on the trip down the two-lane two-direction road.

In Baku, construction cranes dot every horizon, but Muslim traditions and tendencies are well hidden. After days of people watching on the bustling streets, I didn't spot a single burka.

I drop into a language school where thousands of young Azeris learn English. Under the Soviets, all Azerbaijanis were conversant in their language as well as Russian; many are now also learning English.

The school's principal, Senan Huseynov, who also serves in a variety of foreign relations government posts, expressed optimism about Azerbaijan's ability to get along with all sides. "We have very good relations with Israel, we are also proud to have normal relations with Iran. All this is impossible for other countries," he says, adding that "many of the Azerbaijani Jews who moved to Israel following independence have been moving back. They missed it too much here."

Huseynov dreams of seeing Azebaijan become a new Switzerland – a country of comparable geographic size and population – and eventually join the European Union. In its efforts to impress the EU, Azerbaijan has appointed many opposition party members to government committees and it has agreed to place its oil profits into a transparent fund.

Although I don't manage to track down a Jew in Baku, the words of my Toronto-based friend Fema Gelman rings in my ears throughout my trip. Gelman, a bear-like Jewish jazz bassist from Azerbaijan – a country that produces poets and jazz musicians the way Toronto produces stockbrokers and accountants – often speaks with a melancholy tone that only disappears when talking about Azerbaijan. "The seaside! The food! Delicious! The beaches! The women! Beautiful! You go! You will love it!"

He was right. I have a hunch that he might be one of the Jews who eventually returns, too.

Harper, Dion condemn Iran conference

CJN News Services

The prime minister, the leader of the Opposition, Canadian Jews and politicians of all stripes joined an international chorus condemning a Holocaust-denial conference sponsored last week by the government of Iran.

In a statement issued in Ottawa, Prime Minister Stephen Harper said, "On behalf of the government of Canada, I want to condemn, in the strongest terms, this latest example of anti-Israeli and racist statements from the president of Iran. In addition, the conference hosted by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad with the sole purpose of denying the Holocaust is an offence to all Canadians."

The conference, organized by the Iranian Foreign Ministry's Institute for Political and International Studies, was attended by 67 participants from 30 countries, including a lone Canadian, Shiraz Dossa, a professor of political science at St. Francis Xavier University in Nova Scotia. Dossa, who said he is not a Holocaust denier, spoke on the topic "Liberalism, Holocaust and war against Muslims."

> 'Latest example of anti-Israeli and racist statements from the president of Iran'

Other conference participants included several Holocaust-deniers from Europe – among them Robert Faurisson, who twice testified on behalf of neo-Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel at his Toronto trials – former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke and half a dozen haredim from the anti-Zionist Neturei Karta sect.

Critics of the conference slammed it as hateful and incendiary.

Opposition leader Stéphane Dion issued a statement saying, "It was with shock and indignation that I first learned of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's recent comments at an international gathering of Holocaust deniers, solely designed to inflame anti-Israeli rhetoric and spread hate and racism throughout the world.

"On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, our parliamentary caucus and all Canadians I wish to openly denounce not only this recent example of hatred, but the intolerance and lack of mutual understanding that breeds such attitudes."

Responding to a question in the House of Commons, Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay called the conference "an outrage" and "an insult to Holocaust victims" and their descendants.

"Canada's new government and I am sure many others in this House and around the globe condemn this conference, just as we have previously condemned the Iranian president's comments about the Holocaust as hateful," he said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Hezbollah Active Here

TORONTO — Hezbollah is still engaged in fundraising and other activities in Canada several years after the government outlawed the Lebanese group as a terrorist entity, the National Post reported. The Post used the Access to Information Act to obtain secret intelligence assessments generated after Israel's recent war with Hezbollah. One of the heavily edited reports said Hezbollah still has a presence in Canada and its "activities in Canada include fundraising, censored collection and the procurement of equipment."

Deportation Upheld

TORONTO — An alleged former leader of a local arm of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) has lost his court battle to stay in Canada. Issam Al-Yamani, 50, of Mississauga, Ont., says his involvement with the PFLP was a form of freedom of expression that should be protected by the Charter of Rights. But Ottawa banned the PFLP as a terror group in 2003, and the Federal Court ruled no one has a right to belong to a terror group. The Beirut-born Yamani has been in Canada since 1985. According to the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, he was also allegedly involved in the 1977 bombing of an Air Egypt office, but never charged. The Dec. 1 ruling upholds one by the Immigration Refugee Board and brings him closer to the deportation he's been fighting since 1992.

Chanukah by the Falls

NIAGARA FALLS, Ont. — A 20-foot-high chanukiyah sponsored by Chabad Lubavitch of Niagara has joined more than 100 lighting displays along the Niagara Parkway in Niagara Falls, Ont.'s annual Winter Festival of Lights. Mayor Ted Salci joined Chabad to inaugurate the display at a Dec. 17 ceremony featuring latkes and donuts.

CJA Directors Named

MONTREAL — Two former Torontonians have been named directors in the Combined Jewish Appeal department of Federation CJA in Montreal. Israeli-born Yair Szlak is CJA's new campaign director, while Robin Rosenberg becomes director of the women's campaign and women's federation.

School Sells Building

LONDON, Ont. — The London Community Hebrew Day School (LCHDS) has completed the $1-million sale of its building to the University of Western Ontario. The building was a public school before the LCHDS bought it in 1979. The LCHDS will rent the 86-year-old structure until June 2008, then move to a new one on the site of London's Jewish community centre.

Cotler Pleads for Bangladeshi Journalist

MONTREAL — Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler has raised the plight of a Muslim Bangladeshi journalist who faces the death penalty for allegedly damaging his country's international image, in part for attempting to travel to Israel.

Salah Uddin Shoaib Choudhury is standing trial on charges of treason, sedition and blasphemy for also, according to the presiding judge, "praising the Jews and Christians" and "predicting the so-called rise of Islamist militancy in the country."

Through his writings, the judge stated, Choudhury, the editor of an English-language weekly newspaper called Blitz, has "tried to damage the image and relations of Bangladesh with the outside world."

Cotler, a former justice minister, told the House of Commons that Choudhury is being targeted for "promoting Muslim, Christian and Jewish dialogue, peace with Israel and for seeking to attend a conference in Israel for the promotion of peace." A former Bangladeshi minister says there is no basis for the charges, Cotler said, adding that Choudhury has been beaten, received death threats and seen his office vandalized. Cotler urged Bangladeshi authorities to drop the charges.

Montreal Prof Barred

DUBLIN — A University of Montreal professor who wrote a book on Jewish anti-Zionism said he was prevented from giving a blessing from the bimah in Dublin's main synagogue. Yakov Rabkin, an Orthodox historian who wrote A Threat From Within: A Century of Jewish Opposition to Zionism, tried during Dec. 9 Shabbat services to recite a thanksgiving blessing after crossing the ocean, but was stopped by two shul members. Community members said they don't object to his politics or scholarship, but to the fact he was in Ireland at the invitation of the Ireland Palestine Solidarity Campaign, which many Jews say is a hate group.

Big Birthright Gift

NEW YORK — Casino mogul Sheldon Adelson is donating $5 million (US) to pay for 2,000 birthright israel trips. There are more than 20,000 18-to-26-year-old Jews on the waiting list for the free 10-day Israel trips because of insufficient funding. The gift comes as Adelson, 74, is reportedly also starting a foundation that would give $200 million a year to Jewish causes and Israel.

A Chanukah Reminder from

Steeles Memorial Chapel

For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.

Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.

If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.

It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

Teachers withdraw Israel boycott resolution

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In what could be the first skirmish in a dispute between Toronto teachers over the Middle East, a bargaining unit of the Ontario Secondary Schools Teachers Federation (OSSTF) withdrew two controversial – and opposing – motions shortly before the unit's labour council was to discuss them last week.

The first motion would have expressed the support of the Secondary Teachers Bargaining Unit (STBU) for the international boycott campaign against Israel while the second called for that motion to be tabled until experts expressing the Israeli point of view were heard and the union's membership could devise its own policy position on the Middle East.

Arron Eisen, a math teacher at A.Y. Jackson Secondary School, co-authored the second resolution along with his colleague Eric Walker. He said the pro-boycott motion supported a controversial resolution passed by the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) last May.

Eisen said CUPE Ontario's Resolution 50, if adopted, "would be detrimental to the union."

"It was divisive of CUPE, and I didn't want to see that divisiveness within our own union," he said.

What's more, he added, "I believe the CUPE resolution brought CUPE into disrepute in the eyes of the public and I don't want that to happen to the OSSTF."

Eisen said he learned of the resolution after reading an interview with a senior CUPE Ontario official, Katherine Nastovski, in D12 Voice, the newsletter of OSSTF's District 12, which represents teachers in Toronto.

"There have been a number of highly unbalanced articles on the Middle East appearing in D12 Voice," Eisen said. "I didn't react to them, but the last one was the straw that broke the camel's back. I felt it was something I needed to voice opposition to."

When he raised his concerns to colleagues in the union, he learned of the proposed motion in support of the CUPE Ontario position, and he decided to submit his own motion.

Doug Jolliffe, president of District 12, said the motion to support CUPE's position did not originate with the executive. "It came out of a group of teachers who were pushing this from the fall. The first time it came forward officially was when it was presented for the December [STBU] Council." (It was submitted by Jason Kunin of Vaughan Road Academy and Hyssam Hulays of Harbord Collegiate.)

"I don't know why it was withdrawn," Jolliffe said, though if it is resubmitted, "I will be speaking against the motion."

Jolliffe, who stressed he was speaking only in his personal capacity as a member of the STBU's labour council, said the OSSTF has not taken a position on the Middle East conflict, and he would like to keep it that way.

He said he personally does not believe Israel practises apartheid as South Africa did, though some Israeli practices could well be criticized and do resemble apartheid.

However, he asked, if the labour council opens the door to criticism of Israel, why should it stop there?

"In the end, why just Israel? I don't think we should be doing this at all."

The conflict in the Middle East is so complicated, "how do you come up with a resolution in Toronto that deals with it?" he said.

In a mass e-mailing, B'nai Brith Canada warned that the motion could reappear at the January labour council meeting. It urged B'nai Brith supporters to voice their opposition to the motion and to familiarize themselves with the issues.

Eisen also expects the motion to be reintroduced next year. It's the first skirmish in a larger war, he suggested. He said he has support from other teachers at A.Y. Jackson as well as from outside the school.

Until recently, he had remained silent while criticism of Israel was voiced. Now, he said, "People realize it's important to react and speak up."

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said that "we have confidence that District 12 will pay close attention to the opinions of all its members and not act in a precipitous fashion."

He noted that many teachers had contacted congress to express opposition to the motion.

Doing more Jewish with books

From the editor's desk

In the past two weeks in this column, I have urged readers to "do more Jewish," as a way of standing up to the enemies of the Jewish people.

It is my firm belief that this formula is an in-their-face, self-asserting, self-empowering, consciousness-raising, personal statement of defiance and self-confidence against a natural encroachment of excessive worry or loss of hope over a Jewish future that sometimes seems too heavily populated by rogues, thugs and plain old anti-Semites intent on our harm.

The beautiful utility of the formula is that it requires merely a modicum of curiosity and a slightly higher degree of commitment to actually get started. And there are myriad ways of doing so, including lectures, song, dance, study, prayer and group discussions, to name but an obvious few.

Perhaps the easiest way to "do more Jewish" is simply to pick up a book on a Jewish theme – any theme – and travel in, through and along its pages to the destination the author inscribed.

In that vein, I recommend the following recently published books as possible personal starting points.

In the field of Judaica, Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz has just released a 30th-anniversary edition of his seminal guide to the novice Jewish student, called The Essential Talmud (Basic Books, 2006).

The original book arose out of the magnum opus undertaken by the remarkable rabbi to translate the Talmud into modern Hebrew and, along with Random House, to bring forward a new English version.

Described by Time magazine as a "once-in-a-millennium scholar," Rabbi Steinsaltz is an immensely talented gatherer, synthesizer and explainer of vastly disparate material.

The re-released edition of The Essential Talmud contains a new preface by the author along with new material throughout. It is a lucidly written, contextualized, engaging primer that masterfully fulfils the aspiration of its author, namely, "to enable readers to understand the significance of the Talmud" and to serve as an entry point into its fascinating world.

One year earlier, in 2005, the prolific Rabbi Steinsaltz published We Jews: Who Are We and What Should We Do? (Jossey-Bass). This book is "about Jews" and for Jews, as a "private, intimate conversation within the Jewish family." Each of the 12 chapters answers large, fundamental questions concerning the modern condition of the Jewish world. The last chapter, for example, asks "What will become of the Jewish People?"

His answer is important reading in our troubled times. His books are always entertaining and highly informative, worthy reads all of them.

In the field of Bible, the distinguished American biblical literature scholar, Robert Alter has published an artful English translation of The Five Books of Moses (W. W. Norton & Company Inc., 2004) for readers who cannot read the Bible in Hebrew, yet yearn to become more familiar with its historic figures, momentous stories and life-altering instruction. His skill is masterful. And his devotion to the sanctity of the task is evident on every page. He has also added commentary that provides linguistic, historic, anthropological and other informative contexts for the text he so lovingly translated.

In the field of Bible commentary, Rabbi Moshe Lichtman has written Eretz Yisrael in the Parashah (Devora Publishing, 2006).

Born and raised in Elizabeth, N.J., Rabbi Lichtman emigrated to Israel in 1991. As he makes plain in the book's very first pages, his book has an overt purpose in addition to biblical exegesis for its own sake.

"Its goal is to demonstrate how overridingly important Eretz Yisrael is to our religion and encourage Diaspora Jews to at least consider making God's Chosen Land their permanent dwelling place."

The book is primarily a compilation of essays that Rabbi Lichtman wrote "during very trying times" in Israel, beginning in 2000. The tone of the essays reflects those trying times. The author demonstrates his wide scholarship in highlighting the specific references to the Land of Israel in the weekly Torah portions and how they are woven into the beliefs and traditions of Israel.

In the field of poetry, I recommend Within the Song to Live (Gefen Publishing House, 2005) about the songs, poetry and insights of the late Israeli author Natan Yonatan.

The book is a superb introduction to Yonatan, who died on March 12, 2004, and to his poetry: elegaic, pithy, earthy, very much reaching to the heart of ordinary, existential, life-testing trials.

Two features of this book make it especially attractive: the poetry is written in Hebrew and in English; and a CD is included of selected poems from the collection. The music on the CD was written by CJN columnist Gid Koren.

Do more Jewish. Read a book. Any book. The times in which we live call for it. And so do the stirrings of our souls.

ORDER OF ONTARIO

Donald Carr, founding partner of the law firm Goodman and Carr and president of The Canadian Jewish News, was appointed last week to the Order of Ontario, which recognizes the highest level of individual excellence and achievement in any field. Carr was named to the order for serving as counsel and adviser to a wide range of charities and not-for-profit organizations in the province, and for his pro-bono legal work. Carr said he is extremely honoured to be a recipient of the Order. "When I look at what many of the other recipients have done, I feel honoured to be among them," he said. "I have been blessed with partners who not only permit me to spend time on charitable activities, but encourage it as part of the firm's commitment to contribute to a community of which we are part." Other new members of the Order include civil servant Naomi Alboim, orchestra conductor Boris Brott, medical inventor Leon Katz, philanthropist Sandra Rotman and broadcaster Moses Znaimer.

Chabad of Markham celebrates Chanukah

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Skating Maccabees aren't an everyday sight at public arenas in Markham, but thanks to strong bonds Chabad-Lubavitch of Markham, Ont., has forged within its community over the last two decades, they're not entirely unexpected.

"Twenty years ago in Markham, it was a big deal" to see a public Chanukah celebration, said Markham Mayor Frank Scarpitti at Fire on Ice, Chabad's annual skating party held at Clatworthy Arena last Saturday.

With more than 50 per cent of its residents born outside Canada, Markham has become one of Canada's most diverse communities, and Scarpitti called the giant outdoor menorah that now stands at Bayview Avenue and John Street "a symbol of peace and light for everyone."

The evening began with a Havdalah ceremony led by Chabad Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, followed by a menorah-lighting ceremony, Chanukah ice capades featuring demonstrations by two former Olympic skaters, and – last but not least – a public skate with the "skating Maccabee," who roamed the ice, bravely stopping once in a while to help fallen kids or pose for a photo.

MP Susan Kadis as well as regional councillor Jack Heath also joined the celebration, bringing official recognition for Chabad and for the holiday. "I come every year," said Heath. "Jews on ice – how Canadian can you get?" He also admitted: "I come for the latkes. I've already had four."

Latkes scored high for a number of young participants, like Ori Epstein, 3, who sat on his mother's lap happily watching the skaters, his face shiny with cotton candy. Ori also looked forward to being home to light candles in the new menorah he made at Chabad's Torah Tots preschool.

"Chocolate," said Eli Romi-Babanyi, a Grade 5 student at Netivot HaTorah, that's his number one Chanukah treat, along with a chance to light the menorah, not to mention next week's big Florida trip during his school vacation. Other kids said they loved dreidel games and were also enjoying the Chanukah-themed carnival in the arena's lobby.

Chanukah is the festival most closely associated with the Chabad-Lubavitch chassidic movement worldwide, with eager young shiluchim travelling the world to bring a message not just of fun but also of pirsumei nisa, publicizing the miracle.

Through public menorahs, car menorahs and countless inexpensive menorahs given out free, shiluchim like Rabbi Plotkin have worked to spread word of God's miracles for the Jewish people, and spur Jewish pride in places that may not encounter many Jews.

"This is a great opportunity," Scarpitti said, "for young children and families to gather to celebrate faith, celebrate community, during this very special time."

Rabbi Plotkin credits Chabad's success to allies like Scarpitti, who was elected around the same time that Rabbi Plotkin came to Markham. "We're very lucky to have the mayor as a friend."

Chabad has opened its arms to Scarpitti at most of its public celebrations, including welcoming him to a "l'chaim" in its sukkah. Scarpitti enjoys every chance to participate with the Jewish community, but calls Chanukah a "wonderful opportunity," a deeper lesson of peace overcoming persecution.

With great pride, all of us at Goodman and Carr LLP

Women to speak out against domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Women International Canada has created a speakers' bureau to help spread awareness of domestic abuse in the Jewish community.

"We are putting out a call to survivors of abuse who may want to tell their story," says Penny Krowitz, JWI/C executive director. "It is an extremely delicate, emotional issue, and it takes incredible guts and courage [to talk about it]."

The idea, Krowitz said, is not for the woman to get revenge publicly, "but rather to describe the abuse and talk about how she felt while it was going on."

The goal is to help people understand what acceptable behaviour is, and to help identify emotional, psychological, financial and sexual abuse, she said.

"Abuse is an imbalance of power. It is insidious, and it grows slowly. People don't often recognize it," said Krowitz, whose organization launched a billboard campaign about the issue last spring.

"We wanted to create a buzz about the issue, and we absolutely did. [Everyone] in the Jewish community needs to know that we are not immune to domestic violence."

They plan to hold the billboard campaign every Passover, because it is the holiday of freedom, she said.

"If we help one family identify an abusive relationship, then I will feel good."

In an attempt to reach out to youth, JWI/C has partnered with Hillel and has trained university students interested in the topic to go out and speak to groups.

"We want to educate young people about identifying red flags in a relationship. Peer pressure is so strong that sometimes youth accept behaviour [in other people] that is not acceptable.

JWI creates speakers' bureau to spread awareness

"We are in a catch-22 situation. We have lived with the stereotype of the Jewish family being perfect, and that myth can be destructive."

The organization is also working on a needs assessment, in partnership with Jewish Family & Child Service and the University of Toronto school of social work, in order to determine the number of women in abusive relationships and what they need to help them, Krowitz said.

"This will enable us to evaluate services and be proactive in creating healthy environments."

Krowitz said they are "trying to be out there in the community. We have to talk about it publicly so people know that if they are in an abusive relationship, they are not alone. There is help available.

"Getting help does not necessarily mean the marriage is going to break down. It is just the next step. There are many roads to take," she said.

Yvonne (not her real name), 63, who was in an abusive marriage for 18 years – she married her first husband at age 20 – said she has joined the speakers' bureau because she felt so isolated when she was young.

"I would like to help anyone in the situation that I was in for so long."

Her husband began abusing her, she said, the morning after her wedding, and continued throughout the honeymoon. "I was shocked and scared, but my parents had just made me a lovely wedding. I was too embarrassed to tell anyone."

Years of abuse followed, Yvonne said, and "one of the worst incidents was being thrown out in the cold in my nightgown when I was pregnant with my second child."

She never shared her experiences with anyone while she was married, she said. "My feelings ranged from hope that things would change, to pure hate. I was always sad and terrified, and I had resigned myself to my fate."

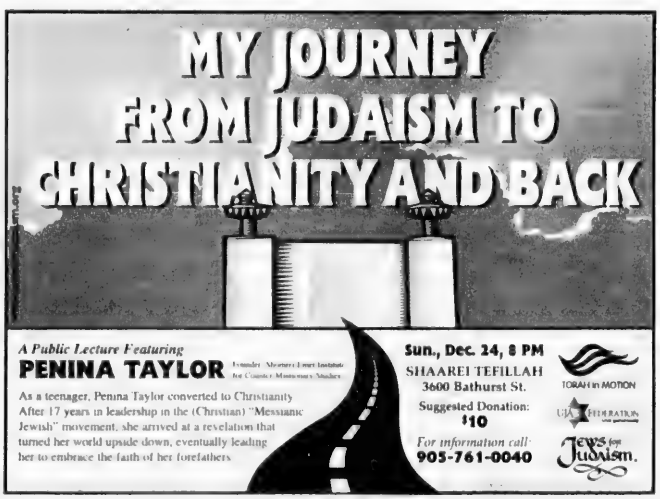
She tried to hide all evidence of abuse, she said, "but my oldest [of three] children would hear him screaming and would come into the room and beg him to stop.

"For years, he would make me cry, but then I stopped and decided I couldn't lower myself anymore. When I finally said, 'That's it,' he threatened to kill himself, and to this day, he says I was unfair."

She had a brief second marriage that didn't work out, she said, "but I have now been happily married for 20 years. I was able to move on.

"I had always had a small income, but when I left my first husband, I went back to work. For that, he did me a favour. I was forced to go to work."

Her advice to women in a similar situation is to "get out. There is help out there. No one is alone anymore."



Women central to Chanukah story, rabbi says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Little is known about women's central role in Chanukah, says Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

"There are all kinds of texts about women and Chanukah, but people are generally unfamiliar with them," she says.

She spoke recently, along with Rachael Turkienicz, director of the Learning Centre, at the first of a three-part series sponsored by the two organizations.

The next two workshops are about women and Passover on March 18, and women and learning on June 3 and 4.

The seeds for the series were planted, says Rabbi Goldstein, after the two co-taught a six-week course about studying texts using a women's perspective.

"We discovered a lot of women are interested in learning about their role in history."

Speaking about the laws and texts on women and Chanukah, Rabbi Goldstein said that although Jews are allowed to work on Chanukah, there is a custom that women don't work during the time the candles are lit, and one should not be lenient about this.

"The reason women are stricter about this than men is because the decrees of the Greeks were harsher on Jewish women."

Regarding the custom of eating dairy on Chanukah, Rabbi Goldstein said that that was also because of woman.

"The Greeks decreed that in order to be married, [a woman] must first have relations with the Greek governor. Yehudit, daughter of Yocharian, the high priest, was very beautiful. The enemy king asked her to sleep with him, and she said she would agree to his request," she said.

"She then fed him dishes of cheese products so that he would become thirsty, and [gave him wine to drink] so he would become drunk and fall asleep.

"She then cut off his head and brought it to Jerusalem. When the head of the Greek army saw that the king was dead, they fled.

"Some people today have the custom of eating dairy dishes on Chanukah to remember the miracle which [occurred] through these dishes."

There is a Sephardi Chanukah tradition, she says, that on the seventh night of the holiday, women hold a gathering at which all who fought with each other during the year agree to reconcile their differences.

Rabbi Goldstein says that by hearing these stories, women become encouraged and inspired to get more active, "because they feel central to the holiday."

Where the world should shudder to go

Francois Heisbourg is a man of great integrity and determination. The indignation that cut and seared its angry wound into his conscience was finally too much to bear without reacting. Thus, the Paris-based researcher single-handedly organized a wide, international band of his research colleagues to protest last week's Holocaust denial conference in Tehran.

Heisbourg is chairman of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London and president of the Geneva Center for Security Policy. As reported last weekend in Ha'aretz, he persuaded some 40 European and North American research institutes to suspend contact with the Iranian Institute for Political and International Studies (IPIS), a leading Iranian think tank that helped organize last week's conference.

According to Ha'aretz, the 40 institutes which includes the Centre for Global Studies at the University of Victoria, led by Gordon Smith – have agreed to suspend ongoing programs with the IPIS and have also refused to join in IPIS meetings or invite IPIS staff to their own forums and to decline travel to Iran sponsored by the Iranian institute.

"IPIS has now forfeited its status as an acceptable partner," Heisbourg told the media. The social scientist explained that he and his colleagues are determined "to make it very, very clear that every time a red line is crossed there actually is a price to be paid."

They are to be commended for taking so unambiguously forthright a stand. So too were the group of prominent individuals – among whom were Meir Rosenne, Dore Gold, Elie Wiesel, Irwin Cotler and Alan Dershowitz who convened last week in New York to urge that the Iranian president be charged with incitement to commit genocide. The moral clarity and resounding courage of their very public opposition to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad ring very loudly against the mostly silent, ineffectual response of the rest of the world.

Ahmadinejad convenes a conference aimed at proving the genocide of the Jews of Europe did not happen, even as he constantly boasts of the need to perpetuate the genocide of the Jews of Israel and feverishly attempts to build or buy nuclear weapons know-how. He long ago crossed an ominous red line and appears headed like a moth to white light, toward a dark, deadly chaos of hell and madness. The world should shudder to go there with him.

But few are the governments, and fewer still the international institutions, that are prepared to make the Iranian regime pay a price for its worrisome and dangerous policies.

Victor Kugler, who helped hide Anne Frank in World War II, died in Toronto at 89. Kugler, a native of Austria, managed a spice business with Frank's father, Otto, in Amsterdam. In July 1942, the Franks and four other Jews went into hiding, and Kugler was among those who brought them food and supplies. Known in Anne's diary as Kraler, he was sent to a camp when the Franks were discovered. He survived and came to Canada in 1955.

Neturei Karta a fringe extremist group

On behalf of the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, the Council of Orthodox Rabbis of Toronto, I want to express our outrage at the participation of outwardly Orthodox-looking men in the recent fiasco of Holocaust denial at a conference in Iran.

These people represent a fringe extremist group, Neturei Karta, who have expressed their anti-Zionism in hateful and outrageous behaviour. Hugging a man intent on the destruction of Israel has not one shred of justification. Do they think that he will destroy Israel but the Jews of Israel will be spared? And that with the destruction of Israel, all the Jews will live happily under Iranian rule?

There should be no confusion that since these men look Orthodox, other Orthodox Jews share their views. On behalf of all the Orthodox rabbis of Toronto, I vehemently express our total opposition to this behaviour.

We pray daily for the welfare of Jerusalem, for the peace of all Jews regardless of political views. We recite psalms for the protection of all the Jews of the Land of Israel in the face of threats of terrorism and war.

On this, the holiday of light, may we all be enlightened with the light of the Torah, whose ways are pleasant and paths are all peaceful.

Hatred emanating from Tehran

Sixty-three years after I stood in the shadows of Auschwitz gas chambers and saw my mother and sister and hundreds of others transported to the gas chamber, I thought that the frequency of my nightmares would diminish. Instead my sleep is invaded almost nightly with intermingled old horrors and new ones. This time my nightmares of unspeakable horrors do not only include the past but also embrace the future as I hold my grandchildren in my embrace.

The Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, at a conference of world-infamous Holocaust deniers, promises annihilation and destruction of Israel and its Jews. Reminiscent of 1930s, it is painful to all Jews, but especially to the small remnant of survivors that is diminishing with each week and each day. The memory of the cruelty of death through gassing, shooting, hunger and brutal beatings of our loved ones are sufferings that we relive daily and that few will ever understand. We lost all our families throughout Europe, and there is now a concerted attempt and conspiracy to erase the memory of those that perished and also to deny that the most horrific crime of the 20th century ever happened. Except for the few world leaders who have the courage to denounce the Iranian threat – among them, thankfully, our own Prime Minister Stephen Harper – there is a deafening silence. The majority of nations and most prominent individuals are silent, there are no mass demonstrations in front of the Iranian embassy and the Muslim organizations are silent.

When will the world understand that Israel is the canary in the mine? Israel's fate and that of the free world are tied together. Israel and the Jewish people may be the first to be targeted but will not be the last in the plans of the Islamist fascists. Together with Israel, the world must stand resolved to fight to overcome this new evil threat to our way of life.

OU doesn't represent all Orthodox Jews

Readers of the article "OU may now oppose Israeli gov't" (CJN, Dec. 7) may get the wrong impression that the Orthodox Union speaks on behalf of all Orthodox Jewry on this continent. The last time I checked, however, there is no democratic process in place for selecting delegates or representatives to this organization. So, while I respect Larry Zeifman's right to express his personal views (or express views in his capacity as the vice-president of OU Canada) and to advise us of his condemnation of certain Israeli government actions, I do not believe that they are truly representative. There are many Orthodox Jews in Canada who are uncomfortable in adopting such a critical view of the Israeli government, as is suggested by the article, yet they have no official spokesperson or lobby group to advocate these views on their behalf.

Seeking a kidney donor

I am the father of seven children and have three grandchildren. As of Dec. 24, 2005, I have been on dialysis for kidney failure. Up until then, I was very active in the community as a chiropractor, helping others to feel better. I have had to give up my practice and still have children in university who require my support.

If there is someone out there who can donate a kidney or know of someone who could help, please contact me. Being an only child, I have no siblings to match up with me.

'What then must be done?'

By IRWIN COTLER

The following is a statement presented in New York City Dec. 14 at an international gathering on brining Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to justice for incitement to genocide in violation of both the Genocide Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide and the Treaty for an International Criminal Court.

We are witnessing – and have witnessed for some time – the emergence of state-sanctioned incitement to genocide whose epicentre is Ahmadinejad's Iran.

The toxic convergence of the advocacy of the most horrific of crimes – namely genocide – embedded in the most virulent of hatreds namely, anti-Semitism.

Propelled by the publicly avowed intent to acquire nuclear weapons for that purpose so as to "eliminate" Israel "in one single storm."

Dramatized by the parading in the streets of Tehran of a Shahab-3 missile draped in the emblem "wipe Israel off the map."

Denying the Nazi Holocaust as it incites to a new Middle Eastern one.

And if this were not enough:

Warning Muslims who would recognize Israel that they will burn in the umma of Islam.

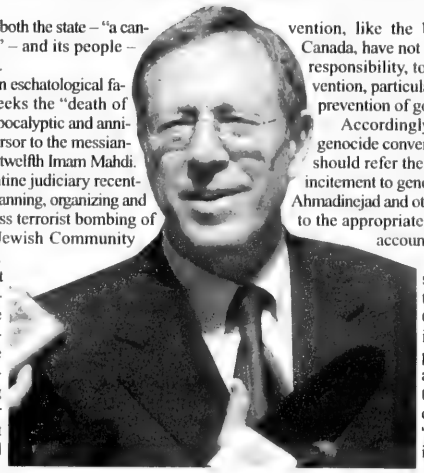
Seeking not only the destruction of a country Israel – but the annihilation of its people.

Demonizing both the state – "a cancerous tumour" – and its people – "evil incarnate".

Inspired by an eschatological fanaticism that seeks the "death of Israel" – as an apocalyptic and annihilationist precursor to the messianic coming of the twelfth Imam Mahdi.

As the Argentine judiciary recently determined, planning, organizing and ordering the mass terrorist bombing of the Argentine Jewish Community Centre (AMIA).

This direct and public incitement to genocide is a standing violation of the genocide convention, constituting not only a clear and present danger to Israel and the Jewish people, but to the international community as a whole.



Irwin Cotler

What then must be done?

1. First, we should support the issuance of arrest warrants by the Argentine judiciary for the named Iranian authorities – including former Iranian president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and Hezbollah operatives.

2. Second, state parties to the genocide convention, like the United States or Canada, have not only a right, but a responsibility, to enforce the convention, particularly as regards the prevention of genocide.

Accordingly, pursuant to the genocide convention, state parties should refer the horrific criminal incitement to genocide by President Ahmadinejad and other Iranian leaders to the appropriate UN agencies for account.

3. State parties should initiate in the International Court of Justice an inter-state complaint against Iran, also a state party to the genocide convention, for its "direct and public incitement to genocide" in violation of the genocide treaty.

4. The situation of the international criminality of President Ahmadinejad, and other Iranian leaders should be referred by the UN Security Council to the special prosecutor of the International Criminal Court for investigation and prosecution.

5. State parties to the genocide convention, which have enabling domestic legislation, should prepare criminal indictments for President Ahmadinejad, former president Rafsanjani, and other Iranian leaders on the basis of the "universal jurisdiction" principle embodied in the genocide convention.

6. A group of international lawyers, including Prof. Alan Dershowitz and myself, are preparing an indictment of president Ahmadinejad and other Iranian leaders for the violation of the prohibition in both the genocide convention and the International Criminal Court Treaty, against the "public and direct incitement to genocide".

There has been a good deal of discussion about holding Iran accountable for its international criminal conduct, particularly its defiance of UN Security Council Resolutions, calling for the suspension of its uranium enrichment process as a prelude to acquiring nuclear weapons. The recommended options have included everything from UN sanctions to military strikes.

It is time that these juridical options be initiated, which might also embolden progressive forces within Iran while holding the responsible individuals accountable. Indeed, recent history has taught us that sustained international juridical remedies can bring about the indictment of seemingly immune dictators, such as Slobodan Milosevic and Augusto Pinochet. This is an opportunity for countries like the United States and Canada to exercise juridical leadership in regard to one of the most important threats confronting the international community.

Indict Ahmadinejad for inciting genocide

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — Barely 48 hours after the conclusion of a government-sponsored Holocaust denial conference in Tehran, Jewish leaders gathered in New York to announce an initiative to bring Iran's president to trial for inciting genocide.

An all-star lineup of prominent politicians, lawyers and Jewish leaders laid out the case against Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, noting his stated objective of "wiping Israel off the map," his consistent denial of the Holocaust, and his country's pursuit of nuclear and ballistic missile capacity.

Ahmadinejad's incitement violates the 1948 UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, speakers said. The Dec. 14 event at the New York County Lawyers' Association was organized by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Even as speakers accused Ahmadinejad of violating the genocide convention, they also sought to lay the groundwork for a military strike if diplomacy and legal action don't derail Iran's quest for nuclear weapons.

"We will try the law. We will try politics. We will try everything," said Alan Dershowitz, a prominent attorney and professor at Harvard Law School. "But if they fail, we will use self defense."

In addition to seeking an indictment of Ahmadinejad in the International Criminal Court, Dershowitz disclosed that he and Canadian MP Irwin Cotler, a former justice minister and prominent human-rights lawyer, were preparing a brief to justify military preemption if legal efforts don't work.

"We waited once, we will not wait again," said Dershowitz, who like other speakers evoked the global silence as the Nazis prepared the Holocaust. "Do not expect passive acceptance of genocide. We will fight back."

Iranian diplomats in New York were unavailable for comment.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Several speakers expressed reservations about placing too much faith in the United Nations.

"When you're thinking about remedies, don't be naive about the United Nations," said Ruth Wedgwood, a noted international lawyer and professor at Johns Hopkins University.

She further cautioned that UN initiatives have a history of being turned around and used as diplomatic weapons against the State of Israel.

Martin Peretz, editor-in-chief of the New Republic, scoffed at the idea that the United Nations could stop Iran. He accused outgoing UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan of being a "handmaiden to Darfur," the region of Sudan where government-sponsored Arab militias have killed tens of thousands, and a silent bystander as genocides unfolded in Rwanda and Bosnia.

Annan "is invited to dinners all over Manhattan, at Jewish tables," Peretz said. "He should be put in cherem," or excommunicated.

Peretz noted also that Annan has avoided using the term genocide to describe the killings in Darfur – a term that would compel international action under the anti-genocide convention.

The resort to legal recourse against Iran was initiated by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, whose president, former Israeli UN ambassador Dore Gold, said Ahmadinejad was in "clear-cut violation of the anti-incitement clauses of the 1948 genocide convention."

Speakers noted two cases in which international law had been used successfully to prosecute war criminals — former Chilean leader Augusto Pinochet and Slobodan Milosevic, former president of Serbia and Yugoslavia.

But neither of those figures was brought up on charges before committing their crimes, leading a questioner to challenge the efficacy of using legal remedies to prevent Ahmadinejad from achieving his objectives.

Dershowitz stressed that the legal initiative was intended to "give the international community a chance to prove itself," a community he noted that includes not only the United Nations but states and non-governmental organizations.

If that effort fails, Dershowitz did not mince words in describing what should be done.

"If the international community fails, if this challenge is not met, we reserve the right of self defence," he said. "We pledge here today to do everything it takes, and anything it takes, to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons. We will not fail. We cannot fail."

Also speaking at the event were outgoing American UN envoy John Bolton, U.S. Congressman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Meir Rosenne, a former Israeli ambassador to the United States.

Opinions

Translated, but not improved

English, unlike Hebrew, can be made gender neutral. Thus, in prayer we can paraphrase the English "Lord" as "Eternal," or "King" as "Sovereign," and not refer to God in the third person. We thereby avoid the question of whether God is male or female. English renderings in many new prayer books reflect this trend.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The Union for Reform Judaism has gone further. In 1996, it published its Haftarah Commentary and made the English references to God in the biblical texts gender neutral. Its recently revised Plaut Torah Commentary has adopted the same principle.

To me, this smacks a little of the Bible, like the prayer books, having been "translated and improved," as they used to describe the Yiddish versions of European classics. The laudable aim is to make sure that, when the English is read aloud, nobody is offended by sexist language. The fact that the original text is thereby distorted seems to matter little.

Though nowadays more Hebrew is being taught in schools and synagogues, several new siddurim offer transliterations of the major prayers, thus turning them into potentially meaningless mantras. The intention here, too, is to make worshippers comfortable. Nobody should be excluded because of a lack of Hebrew skills. But the effect is ominous. Implying that Hebrew is ultimately not essential, and thus further diminishing the status of Judaism's indigenous language, it's another manifestation of the neglect of content in favour of "feel good." And when content becomes secondary, Jewish prayer itself – with its strong emphasis on theology – becomes problematic.

My fear is that, because inclusive language is only possible in English – the first or second language of most Diaspora Jews – it may in the end usurp Hebrew as the primary vehicle of authentic Jewish discourse. This would divide the Jewish world.

Since inclusive language is not possible in Hebrew, in Israel, even ardent modernists have learned to live with it. They add the names of the Matriarchs in the Amidah and occasionally even use a feminine sounding name of God, but these are feeble tokens, and Hebrew-speaking worshippers know it.

Because Hebrew is the primary language of the sources of Judaism, their truthful translations must take precedence over political correctness. This doesn't compel us to perceive God in terms of gender, only to accept the inadequacy of human language.

Judaism leaves us with many problems that, though not resolved, should not stop us from praying. Among these is how to sincerely refer to God, despite the limitations of grammar. Unlike many modernists, I am prepared to live with the difficulty in fear that the solution is worse.

I pray in the belief that God accepts all my shortcomings, including this one.

Just a little bit of teamwork

The most frustrating thing I have ever run into in my adventures in academia is the "group project" – words so dreaded that they cause even the mightiest student to quake in fear.

With most assignments, you get a handout – an instruction sheet of some kind, on which are directions that, if followed, will lead to academic success. Such projects are relatively simple – indeed, they're comparable to a simple race: here is the starting line, here is the finish, go do all the steps between.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

Simplicity itself.

The group project takes that simple race and messes with it. Now you have to run the race tied to another runner, or perhaps multiple runners, none of whom you can choose. Other complications may arise: some runners come without shoes, or can only run certain portions of the race, or don't know how to run at all. Now you're no longer simply running from start to finish – you're dragging the limp bodies of your teammates, with bullets flying overhead and explosions ripping through the air.

You are, for lack of a better word, screwed.

The particulars of how you're going to do the group project don't really matter. If you all work together, invariably one or two people shoulder most of the workload. If you divide it up evenly among everyone in the group, some people will undoubtedly do a horrendous job and others will do nothing at all. In the end, the responsible element – usually you – gets stuck trying to make sure everything gets done, and done well.

The mathematical odds of this actually happening are comparable to the likelihood of your inept group members spontaneously combusting and saving you the trouble of having to deal with them.

As such, a successful group project requires divine intervention, and probably a few stiff drinks.

As Jews, we can easily relate to how a group project can be potentially disastrous. There's a saying that says something to the effect of "two Jews, three opinions." Well, the truth is that this aphorism isn't Jew-specific. It turns out that people in general are like this. At your first group meeting, everyone shouts out – all at the same time – their brilliant solution to everything and the result is the combination of a disaster and catastrophe that is greater than the sum of its parts – what you might call a "disastrophe."

Now I'm sure that many of you are thinking it's a good idea to force people to do group projects in university, because it's extremely likely that during our careers we'll have to work with people who are at least one pancake short of a full stack.

Better to develop strategies while you're learning, right? Wrong. This idea of work-by-committee must be stopped.

We civilized monkeys have taken group work and made it the way everything else in our society functions.

For instance, the government uses committees for practically everything, and consistently exhibits the stunning efficiency that we have come to expect from it. We've also asked all the world's governments to send a representative to New York and made a committee out of them! The result is a potentially massively powerful international organization that could be like a just Godzilla to an evil Tokyo, but is too confused to knock anything over, or even climb the Empire State Building, a la King Kong.

Truly notable accomplishments are almost always attributed to individuals. Einstein thought up relativity, Alexander the Great conquered the known world, and George Foreman was the heavyweight champ – twice – and he makes a mean grill.

None of these people used group projects to accomplish the things they did. They knew that success was always in their own hands.

But since group projects don't seem to be going away any time soon, it's the personal responsibility of those who take part in them to come with their running shoes laced up, ready to run the race.

A King's Chanukah

Last week, we celebrated Chanukah at King's College with an evening of latkes, sufganiyot, dreidels and even a bit of music. It's the first time since I've been at King's that we've celebrated the holiday in this way.

The last time there was any sort of Chanukah celebration on campus was when I was in first year and our gracious residence dining hall managers made latkes for dinner one night. Though they had the best of intentions, the latkes were not very successful, for a number of reasons. First of all, the letter "t" was left out of the dinner menu that night, so students were confused as to why (and how) they would be consuming "lakes" for dinner. Secondly, for some strange reason, it was decided that instead of finding an actual latke recipe, the best way to make latkes was to take a normal pancake mix and simply add pureed potatoes and chopped onions. Needless to say, they didn't taste quite like the home-cooked wonders we Jews were boasting about to our friends.

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

Many of these said friends ordered pizza that night.

In many ways, our latest Chanukah party rectified this situation, even if it came three years later and I was the only one who remembered the 2003 "lakes" disaster. This year, the latkes were delicious, and the turnout was fantastic – due not only to the generally wide appeal of Chanukah, but also to the need for procrastination that the exam season inevitably heralds, and the fact our party took place during the first snowstorm of the year in Halifax, and people had an extra need for the warm and fuzzies.

While the Jewish students on campus who came to the party expressed an appreciation for it, in the past, students haven't pushed for a Chanukah party because they felt they get their dose of the holidays through campus-wide Christmas events.

It's interesting that at a school like King's, which in its early years required all of its students to take a vow to the Anglican Church – to which it still has ties – religious events, in themselves, rarely take centre stage. There is still a chapel on campus, but its choir is composed mostly of atheists, and it even includes some Jewish students who just want a high-quality choral experience. Very few students actually attend the chapel.

King's has a communal atmosphere, with a large number of students gathering many days of the week for fun events such as plays, lectures or formal meals. During the holiday season, Christmas events such as carolling, listening to stories by the fire and consuming large amounts of food at a special brunch are simply fun events that happen to be taking place that week. They're almost devoid of religious content. For non-Christians on campus, this is great – as it feels inclusive and non-threatening – but I wonder how the Christian minority feels. Is this just a reflection of the secularism at work in the larger society, or is it an example of watering-down Christian culture in the name of political correctness?

I think that our Chanukah celebration provided a good model for future cultural and religious celebrations at King's. Just by having the event, we reminded the school that there are Jews on campus and that we have a particular way of celebrating during the holiday season. Also, unlike campus-wide Christmas celebrations, this event was organized entirely by students, allowing the leadership-inclined to really take charge and shape the course (and taste!) of the evening. Finally, we maintained King's tradition by having it as inclusive affair, and we were pleased to have in attendance both students and faculty, including the college chaplain – who is the minister of the Anglican chapel.

I hope that we showed everyone on campus a good ol' Jewish time and that King's can handle more than one type of celebration – one that need not be watered-down in any way.

Maybe in the future we'll even try to celebrate a holiday that doesn't fall during the "holiday season."

Jewish Toronto

Ted Rogers to be honoured by UJA Federation, CIJA

Ted Rogers, president and chief executive officer of Rogers Communications Inc., has been named as the recipient of this year's Words & Deeds Leadership Award, sponsored jointly by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA). CIJA is the umbrella organization for Jewish community advocacy in Canada, helping to improve the quality of Jewish life in Canada and abroad, increase support for Israel, and strengthen the Canada-Israel relationship.

The announcement was made by former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, this year's Words & Deeds Leadership Award chair, together with dinner co-chairs Ivan Fecan, president and CEO of Bell Globemedia, and Peter Godsoe, former chair and CEO of Scotiabank.

The dinner to honour Rogers will be held at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel on Tuesday, April 17. It follows last year's inaugural Words & Deeds Dinner, which honoured RBC Financial Group president and CEO Gordon Nixon.

The Words & Deeds Leadership Award recognizes Canadian leaders whose contribution to humanitarian causes, social cohesion and inclusion, and civil discourse in Canadian society has been outstanding.

"I am delighted to be honoured with the Words & Deeds Leadership Award," said Rogers. "The organizations involved do excellent work and it is gratifying to follow such a distinguished recipient as Gord Nixon. Like Gord, it has always been my goal to do what I can to enrich our community experience."

Ted Rogers

"We are thrilled that Mr. Rogers has accepted our invitation to be the next Words & Deeds honouree," said UJA Federation of Greater Toronto chair David Engel. "His efforts on behalf of education in the community have been tireless, an outstanding example of putting his principles to work for the good of the entire community."

Joining the award chair and dinner co-chairs are honourary co-chairs Brent Belzberg and Steven Cummings who head CIJA; Gordon Nixon; Gerald Schwartz, CEO of ONEX Corporation; and Lawrence Tanenbaum, chairman and CEO, Kilmer Van Nostrand Co. Ltd., and chairman of the board, Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment Ltd. which owns the Toronto Raptors and the Toronto Maple Leafs.

"Many are aware of Ted's exceptional business acumen and gift for innovation, but I am delighted that the community will now learn of Ted's behind-the-scenes work in support of Canada's universities and colleges," said Tanenbaum. "Ted is truly a great Canadian who influences all of us to follow his example of humanitarianism and philanthropy."

"We are thrilled to have an honouree such as Ted Rogers, providing the Jewish community a reason to celebrate the numerous contributions made by Ted – to the entire Canadian community," said Belzberg. "His philanthropic work supporting higher education and health care are perfect examples of good words and deeds coming together for the benefit of all."

Rogers Communications Inc. is Canada's largest cable relevision operator, with substantial telecommunication and publishing interests. Rogers also owns the Toronto Blue Jays baseball club.

Top 10 Year End Tax Planning Tips

The countdown is on!

With only ten days left to year-end, here are my top 10 tax planning ideas that must be completed by year-end in order to realize the tax savings for the 2006 tax year:

By JAMIE GOLOMBEK

Jamie Golombek

1. Tax loss selling

December 22 is the deadline to sell any stocks and have the trades settle in 2006 to be able to recognize any accrued capital losses on your 2006 tax return.

2. Pay investment expenses by December 31

Investment-related expenses such as interest, investment counseling fees or safety-deposit box rental fees must be paid by year-end to be deductible.

3. RESP contributions for 15 year-olds

If you have a (grand)child who has never participated as a beneficiary in a Registered Education Savings Plan and who turned 15 this year, Dec. 31 is your last chance to contribute at least $2,000 to his or her RESP. You will be allowed to collect the maximum Canada Education Savings Grant (CESG) for 2006 and create eligibility for 2007 and 2008.

4. Final RRSP contribution

If you turned 69 earlier this year, you only have until Dec. 31 to make your last RRSP contribution, if you plan to do so.

5. Converting Your RRSP

As above, if you turned 69 in 2006, you must convert your RRSP into either a Registered Retirement Income Fund (RRIF) or an annuity by Dec. 31.

6. Gifts to employees

If you're an employer, you have the opportunity to make up to two non-cash gifts a year on a tax-free basis to your employees for special occasions such as Chanukah, marriage, birthdays or other similar events, where the combined cost of the gifts is less than $500.

7. Purchase business assets

Consider accelerating the purchase of new business equipment you were planning to buy next year to be able to claim one half of a full year's tax depreciation in 2006.

8. Delay withdrawals under the Home Buyer's Plan

Planning to buy a new home in January? Delay withdrawing money from your RRSP under the federal HBP until 2007 to allow you one additional year before repayments must begin.

9. Reduced source deductions

If you regularly receive a large income tax refund each spring, consider completing CRA's Form T1213 early to allow your employer to reduce the amount of tax withheld at source beginning with your first January 2007 pay cheque.

10. Charitable donations

Finally, keep in mind that December 31 is also the last day to make a donation and get a tax receipt for 2006. Scrambling to donate? Remember that many charities now offer online, Internet donations where an electronic tax receipt is generated and e-mailed to you instantly. (To donate to UJA, visit: www.ujadonations.com)

New initiative offers Israel's teens a brighter future

By DAN HOROWITZ & RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

Natalie Biton, a 16-year-old participant in a new Israeli project called Unistream, never used to think about what she had; only what she didn't have. Since becoming involved with the program, the Israeli teen - who grew up in a poor family - has a new and positive outlook on life.

"Thanks to Unistream, I have learned the importance of contributing to the community which, in turn, has allowed me to appreciate how much I have, and the act of giving allows me to feel good about myself," she says.

As part of its partnership with Israel's southernmost region of Eilat-Eilot, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is funding the business and leadership education program for teenagers in the area. It is an example of the components of UJA Federation's Youth Futures initiative in Eilat. Youth Futures is a holistic program designed to provide at-risk children living in remote parts of Israel with equal educational opportunities.

"Unistream was founded on the conviction that the most effective way to help Israel is to develop a new generation of business and social leaders committed to improving economic and social conditions in their community," says founder and chairman Rony Zarom.

The Eilat centre opened in October to coincide with the start of the school year. It is the fifth in the country. Fifty Eilat teenagers, identified as self-starters who come from poorer families, were chosen from 250 applicants to take part in Unistream's youth entrepreneurship program.

Over the course of three years, participants establish their own start-up companies, operate social action projects in their communities such as big-brother/sister initiatives, meet with top executives and business leaders, and gain the skills and self-confidence that position them as Israel's future leadership. Bi-weekly workshops focus on leadership and empowerment, business skills, and community involvement.

"It was a wonderful experience meeting these wonderful teenagers who, although they came from poorer backgrounds, had a very positive perspective about the future," says Harold Wolfe, who was in Eilat for the inauguration of Unistream. "We talked about how to create business plans and what it takes to build a successful business. But we also talked about their dreams and aspirations. Unistream is a wonderful and important initiative."

"Unistream is important in that it gives young people a chance to not only hope but to realize the opportunities waiting for them in making future life decisions based upon higher education," says Brian Shachter, co-chair, UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 committee. "The teens in Eilat whom we met were not only excited about the program, they told us that their views on their own opportunities have been greatly increased by being involved in this process."

Activities revolve around the program centre, where participants meet, plan and work on their projects, and hear from the business-people who volunteer their time delivering lectures or workshops to inspire and educate participants.

"Unistream has taught me that I can reach high," says Etti Ben Dahan, a 17-year-old participant. "I have learned to plan my future, not to be afraid of taking risks, never to give up on a dream and to work to make it happen."

Toronto philanthropist Harold Wolfe speaks with one of the teenagers taking advantage of the Unistream initiative in Eilat. Wolfe was in Eilat in October for the inauguration of the city's Unistream centre.

"The Unistream centres are located in the students' own impoverished neighbourhoods in order to give them a sense of ownership, pride and community building," says Iris Reff-Ronen, CEO of Unistream. "The Eilat centre is equipped with sophisticated technology that provides a stimulating environment for thinking, learning and developing leadership skills."

While official workshops are held twice a week, the drop-in-style centres are open until 8 pm daily and also function as a home away from home for the teens, many of whose parents are unemployed or earning minimum wage. "The program centre may be the only place where these kids get hot meals," adds Reff-Ronen.

Historic UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign comes to a close

Record $81 million raised - $20 million earmarked for Israel's emergency needs

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

Capping the most successful annual campaign in UJA Federation of Greater Toronto history, 500 community members gathered Monday, December 18, the third night of Chanukah, to celebrate the success of Israel Emergency Campaign (IEC) 2007 in addition to remembering why it was necessary to begin with.

Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 raised $81 million, with $20 million in emergency aid going directly to Israel.

Exceptional volunteers were recognized at the campaign closing, and campaign chairs for 2008 Lesley Binstock-Offman and Morris Perlis were introduced.

"Toronto stepped up without any prodding or pushing," said Fred Waks, chair of the IEC along with Ariella Rohringer. "I'm a results-oriented person and the results speak for themselves."

"This was a campaign of firsts," says Rohringer. "We were the first community to launch an emergency campaign. We were the first to land dollars on the ground in northern Israel in the midst of the war. We had the greatest number of canvassers ever assembled in a Toronto annual campaign, and of course, the total dollars raised have never been higher. The Jewish people have paid dearly in our quest for a homeland and we must never lose sight of the important role we play in supporting Israel. It is incumbent upon us to do everything we can to ensure that Israel prospers. I am so grateful to have had the honour of chairing the IEC 2007."

Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy Judith Finer Freedman (left), with the chairs of the Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 Fred Waks and Ariella Rohringer, in Israel on a fact-finding mission prior to the start of this year's campaign.

The community's commitment to Israel and local Jewish institutions and programs was particularly evident in a record-setting year for Women's Campaign & Advocacy's (WC&A) as well, which raised more than $9 million for the campaign.

"There was a whole new energy and spirit in the campaign this year," said Judith Finer Freedman, chair of WC&A. "A lot of young women in the community wanted to come out and give back to the Jewish community and they wanted to roll up their sleeves to do the hard work."

But amidst the smiles and festivities, there was a sober awareness of why the emergency campaign, begun a month earlier than usual this year, was so important in the first place. Dennis Ross, the former American point man in both the Bush Sr. and Clinton administrations for the Middle East conflict addressed the closing, sharing his insights and views on the ongoing quest for peace in the Middle East.

"Unfortunately, I think that the emergency campaign is one that will be with us for some time," said Waks. "Until some things are resolved on an international basis – like Iran hosting a Holocaust denial convention – we've got our work cut out for us."

Israel Emergency Campaign funds provided enormous assistance to northern Israel residents by:

- outfitting bomb shelters with air conditioners
- providing families with weekend getaways
- sending children to summer camp in safer areas of the country
- offering small business loans and vocational counseling for those who lost their jobs because of the war
- funding trauma counseling
- supplying new equipment for schools and other buildings destroyed by katyushas
- providing student scholarships to encourage young adults to remain in the north
- assisting victims of terror and their families

Hillel of Greater Toronto launches campaign for missing soldiers

UJA Federation supports the initiative to remember the captives

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

Thanks to the creativity of two Hillel of Greater Toronto leaders, an idea started on campus is quickly spreading to the community-at-large.

The Campaign for the Missing Soldiers - the brainchild of Hillel's Israel advocacy and education program coordinator Rebecca Woods Baum and Jerusalem native Dafna Regev, Hillel's Israeli cultural program coordinator for a year in Toronto - was created shortly after the war ended.

Hillel of Greater Toronto's Rebecca Woods Baum (left) and Dafna Regev, pose in front of a photo of the three Israeli soldiers kidnapped this summer, sparking the war with Hezbollah. The women created Hillel's Campaign for the Missing Soldiers to raise funds for the soldiers' families.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which financially supports Hillel , is cooperating closely with the Hillel campaign through joint initiatives involving UJA Federation's Israel Forum. UJA also bought 500 pins which were given to participants at this week's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 closing.

"Dafna came to Toronto from Israel in September and, together, we thought of a number of ways we could get people to focus on the human element of the war. We wanted to show that the three missing soldiers are not merely statistics, but somebody's son, brother or uncle."

On June 25, Israel Defense Forces corporal Gilad Shalit was wounded and abducted by a group of Palestinian terrorists inside of Israel on the Gaza border. On July 12, two more soldiers – Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev – were also abducted, this time by Hezbollah on Israel's side of the Lebanese border.

The vehicle the two young women came up with – after many late-night brainstorming sessions – to convey their message is a black pin with no text or photos, just three distinct white lines down one side. Each line represents one of the soldiers.

"We didn't want to write anything on the pin so that it might initiate dialogue," says Woods Baum who credits countless Hillel students with helping to create the pin's design. "We hope that people will see them, be curious, and ask about them, and that it will raise awareness about the issue. Our ultimate goal is that there will eventually be a groundswell of support for this campaign, and that people will voice their outrage at these kidnappings. We want to ensure that these kinds of tactics do not become a regular aspect of war."

So far, Hillel has raised close to $1,000 by selling the two dollar pins on campuses throughout the city, and it has plans for the future including an awareness-raising initiative in partnership with the Israel Forum, a UJA Federation initiative.

The Torontonians also took hundreds of the pins to the recent Hillel International Conference held in Baltimore.

All money raised from the sale of the pins will go to The Karen Maor Foundation, which was founded to assist and support the families of the kidnapped soldiers in their struggle to free their sons.

"As an Israeli, I am so proud of Toronto's students. They fill my heart with so much hope for the future," says Regev. "I can't believe how much these young people care about Israel. This is my first time in Toronto and I must say the Jewish community here is unbelievable."

"When you realize that an initiative as important as this one came from our city's university campuses; you can't help but feel proud," says UJA Federation board chair, David Engel, who visited Corporal Shalit's father Noam in Israel this summer. "These are the future leaders of our Jewish community and through this campaign to remember the missing soldiers, these young men and women have displayed compassion, sensitivity and visionary leadership which bodes well for our future."

New sports pavilion honours late Toronto philanthropist

In honour of Phil Granovsky z"l, his wife Shirley, daughter Maxine and son-in-law Ira Gluskin have committed five million dollars to UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign to build the Phil Granovsky Sports and Recreation Pavilion as the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan. Pictured clockwise from far left are: Mark S. Anshan, general counsel and director, Public Affairs, UJA Federation; David Koschitzky, vice chair of the board, UJA Federation; Maxine Granovsky; Ira Gluskin; Ted Sokolsky, president & CEO, UJA Federation; Jeffrey Kaufman, solicitor for the Granovsky Gluskin family; Shirley Granovsky; and Carol Seidman, director, Capital Campaign, UJA Federation, who were present as Maxine Granovsky and Ira Gluskin ceremoniously signed their contract. Portions of the Phil Granovsky Sports and Recreation Pavilion, set to open by the fall of 2008, are already under construction.

Rabbi seen as source of validation for modern Orthodox

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The loneliness referred to in the title of Rabbi Joseph Ber Soloveitchik's seminal work The Lonely Man of Faith may refer to the loneliness of his own position in the Orthodox community rather than to that of a religious man in a secular world, a panel discussing his legacy agreed.

The discussion took place at the closing session of a recent day-long program at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation under the auspices of Torah in Motion, Yeshiva University (YU) and the adult education committee of the synagogue.

Panellists were Rabbi Shalom Carmy, professor of Bible at Yeshiva University; Ethan Isenberg, creator and director of a new documentary film called Lonely Man of Faith: the life and legacy of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik; Arnold Lustiger, editor of a new Yom Kippur machzor with commentary adapted from the rabbi's teachings; and David Shatz, professor of philosophy at Yeshiva University. The moderator was Elliott Malamet, a teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and a co-founder of Torah in Motion.

Rabbi Soloveitchik, referred to affectionatly as the Rav, is considered the mentor of modern Orthodoxy. He founded Maimonides school in Boston, the first day school in the United States, and later was rosh yeshiva at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS) of Yeshiva University. He was an ardent proponent of Torah u'maddah, belief in the coexistence of Torah and modern science.

This position, though, often put him at odds with the trend toward the isolationism of much of the Orthodox world, the panel noted.

Shatz explained that the Rav saw secular studies as a tool to better understand the Torah and the Jewish worldview. At the same time, he saw Torah as the way to better understand the world. To the Rav, secular knowledge had an intrinsic value as a source of truth, and truth, he believed, is valuable in itself, Shatz said.

Rabbi Carmy said Rabbi Soloveitchik "used the arsenal of liberal arts studies to better understand the word of God in his published works. He regretted that because of his commitment to communal affairs, he didn't have the time to devote to secular subjects that he would have wanted to."

However, Rabbi Carmy added, "he saw them as valuable for himself and others, provided they don't interfere with Torah studies."

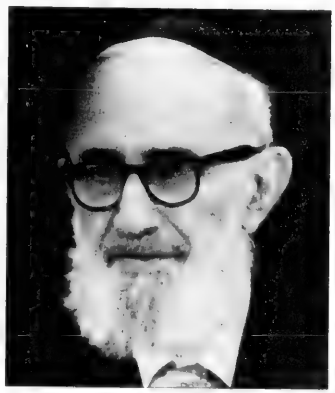
Isenberg said the Rav was proud that students at YU went to study physics directly after a class on Torah.

Another facet of Rabbi Soloveitchik that Malamet in particular found interesting was that the Rav claimed not to be bothered by such things as Creation, Revelation and biblical criticism, all of which are major issues in theological thought today. "Was it simply a matter of faith?" Malamet wondered.

Shatz replied that the Rav was interested in the inner experiences of people, not in metaphysics. "These questions simply were not the most important thing in the modern world to him."

Rabbi Carmy suggested that "if someone isn't bothered by something, there is no reason to force oneself to be bothered. The real issue, Rabbi Soloveitchik considered, was what was to be done with one's life?"

Turning to the question of Rabbi Soloveitchik's attitude toward Israel and Zionism, Lustiger said the Rav saw the land itself as holy – whether or not there was a political state. "[He] had no element of messianism in his philosophy. For instance, right after 1967, he said that if security demanded giving back the Kotel, then that is what must be done – it was an issue of pikuach nefesh," the halachic imperative that the saving of life supersedes almost any other consideration.



Rabbi Joseph Ber Soloveitchik

That being said, Lustiger noted, Rabbi Soloveitchik also stressed that "we must recognize that Arabs are [descendants of] Amalek, and so are not to trusted [in issues about Jews or Israel]."

While the Rav didn't endorse any political plan, Rabbi Carmy said, he was opposed to Israeli militarism. "He was suspicious of the ideology of Gush Emunim [the settlement movement]. While he never intervened in Israeli politics…, after Camp David, he hoped that God would give Israeli leadership power to do the right thing. Too many rabbis were giving halachic rulings on the situation, the Rav believed."

Similarly, Rabbi Carmy said, the Rav would have lamented the alienation of many religious Zionist settlers after they were forced to leave Gaza in 2005. "If you see God's hand in the establishment of the state, it is irrational to abandon it if the government of the day isn't doing what you want."

Shatz said one of the problems in the Orthodox world today is that there are no gedolim (great scholars) to address issues of concern.

"The average modern Orthodox Jew looks to Rabbi Soloveitchik for validation of their position on Zionism, education and the role of women," he said. "The problem, however, is they want to create a kind of cult – since the Rav said something about an issue, they don't have to do anything about it."

Lustiger noted that while modern Orthodox Jews are troubled by the lack of someone to follow Rabbi Soloveitchik, the haredi world is desperately trying to to create a gadol – one gadol to be the ultimate arbiter of the entire Orthodox community.

Veteran teacher believes in learning with students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Tova Dror believes that every child is capable of learning.

"We just have to find the way that is the best for him to learn and shine," said the veteran Jewish studies teacher in a recent early-morning interview at United Synagogue Day Schools' Beth Tikvah campus, where she teaches grades 4 and 5.

An energetic 59-year-old mother of two grown sons who also teaches at Beit Rayim Hebrew School, Dror said many students feel Hebrew is a "mission impossible."

She tells them "never to despair."

Dror – who was born in Hungary but lived in Israel from the time she was a year old – hopes her students will take heart from her own experience as a youngster learning English in Bat Yam.

She "just couldn't get it," she said.

After months of frustration and "trying to hide" in class, she made up her mind that if others could learn the language, she could, too. A fellow classmate tutored her for several years, and by the time she graduated, she was at the top of her class.

Dror also shares her story so students can see how the language may become more relevant for them in the future, as English did for her.

"Who thought I would ever leave Israel and go abroad?" she asked.

But as a young bride, fresh out of high school, she ended up living in Los Angeles for eight years with her husband Joseph, now an electronic engineer.

"I thought I was fluent in English, but boy was I mistaken!" Dror recalls. Her students helped her with colloquialisms, and she studied diction and phonics to take the edge off her strong accent.

As a student at the University of Judaism – where she received a BA in Jewish education and took courses toward a master's degree – Dror was approached about a teaching position at a Jewish supplementary school.

"I loved it," she said. "I always liked to work with kids."

She has been teaching in North America ever since, aside from a three-year stint as an English teacher back in Israel. The Drors returned there in 1973, when Joseph, a seventh-generation Israeli, began to serve as an officer in the Israel Defence Forces.

Three days after she arrived in Toronto, Dror had an interview at USDS. She has been teaching there for the past 30 years.

A lesson from the teacher: "I think that you have to respect each student as an individual.

"Don't judge them; be there for them. If they feel you won't judge them or criticize them, you're all in a process of learning together. They learn from me, I learn from them. I point out my mistakes. If the teacher can do it, so can they."

Over the years, she has continued her professional development. "We used to teach everybody the same way," she said. "Now we work in multiple intelligences [an approach that recognizes different modes of learning] and address the needs of every child."

She doesn't believe that children have really changed over the past three decades. "Children are always curious," she said, citing her students' thirst for knowledge as a constant.

To feed that thirst, she finds that storytelling is "a good tool," she said. She likes to use intonation and other dramatic techniques to "make the study more interesting for [the students]."

Dror finds that teaching – helping children grow both academically and emotionally – gives her "a sense of accomplishment like none other.

"That's the beauty of this profession. Not very many people can say they get up in the morning and like to come to their place of work.

"I look forward every day to the new challenges, and seeing the kids."

Jewish Life

The veil of tolerance

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

People are inherently tribal. Left to themselves, they will happily self-segregate and form their own little ghettoes. No one created Toronto's Chinatown, Little Italy, or, for that matter, the Bathurst Street corridor. The Chinese, Italians and, yes, Jews themselves all prefer the comforts and familiarity of being among their own.

Just as a neighbourhood helps to identify a person, the clothing we choose to wear does the same. A man in a business suit distinguishes himself from another man sporting overalls, and clothing can also distinguish people along cultural lines. By wearing a specific item, people show that they're members of a specific group. In doing so, they are, at the same time, professing not to be part of the general public.

It's just such a statement of separateness that has all of Europe in an uproar.

The once-homogenous countries of Europe are having a hard time with a relatively recent reality: multiculturalism – or, to put it more bluntly, the mass influx of Muslims into Europe.

The issue goes much deeper than the right of women to veil their faces. Rather, the problem is the perception that adopting this mode of dress marks a deliberate rejection of western secular norms. This, of course, is a classic case of two civilizations clashing. What is to one person an expression of natural and decent feminine modesty is to the other an oppressive, bigoted and an in-your-face rejection of the dominant culture.

The issue is now well past the stages of discontented murmurs, editorials or even racist platforms of fringe parties. It's now being openly and publicly addressed by heads of state, governments and legislatures.

Note British Prime Minister Tony Blair's recent call to radical Muslims to integrate, to "conform to [Britain] or don't come here," and note, too, France's outright outlawing of head coverings in its public school system.

What needs to be debated is whether this kind of attitude is itself an expression of intolerance, or is it simply a corrective reaction to too much tolerance or to pluralism that has run amok.

What also needs to be considered is whether this xenophobic sentiment is now in a way replacing traditional anti-Semitism. Are these Muslim issues turning the Muslims into today's new Jews? Have Muslims displaced us and made themselves into the lightning rod for people's discomfort with anything different from themselves that they don't understand?

If these issues continue to fester, how will this affect us as Jews? Will other cultural, ethnic or religious peculiarities come to be denounced as well? Will all of our own particular differences be tolerated? Will common sense prevail? And exactly just how common is common sense?

The characteristic of smugness is seldom, if ever, appropriate – and that's all the more true when we could be the next target.

Our world would be just so much grander if everyone would just live and let live.

Guest Voice

Gay rulings go beyond halachah

By RABBI JOEL ROTH
JTA

Earlier this month, the Conservative movement's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards validated three responsa, or tshuvot, on the general subject of homosexuality.

In fact, the primary technical issue was the Jewish legal status of sex between members of the same gender. From the answers offered to that question followed the views of the authors as to the permissibility of commitment ceremonies – implying, of course, a need also for "uncommitment ceremonies" – and the ordination of gays and lesbians as clergy, who serve as exemplars of commitment to Halachah.

Two of the papers reaffirmed the classical position of Jewish law forbidding such sexual activity and, therefore, forbade commitment ceremonies and the ordination of gays and lesbians.

The third paper permitted most sexual activity between men – forbidding only intercourse – and sexual activity between women. As a result, the authors of this paper permit commitment ceremonies and ordination.

I was the author of one of the papers that reaffirmed the classic Jewish legal position, a position I had affirmed in 1992 when this subject was last on the law committee's agenda

Despite the popular view of what we were arguing about, I believe that the subject of gays was not what we were really divided over. It happened to be the specific subject that revealed the real fault lines in the committee, and in the Conservative movement in general.

I believe we were divided over the following irreconcilable issues:

• How entitled are we to overturn long-standing and uncontested precedents of Jewish law? None of the authors of any of the papers denied what the uncontested precedents of Jewish law are, and that the preponderant majority of decisors of Jewish law from time immemorial considered all types of sexual behaviour between members of the same sex to be a prohibition of biblical status – d'oraita – based on rabbinic interpretation of scriptural verses, midrash halachah.

What divided us was the question of our right to adopt a legal stance attributed to one sage that the prohibitions against sexual behaviour other than male intercourse are rabbinic in status, d'rabbanan, and not biblical, which attribution is itself open to serious question and is denied by most decisors.

• Even if the prohibition against sexual behaviour other than male intercourse is rabbinic in authority and not biblical, what justifies our abrogating that prohibition? The authors of the permissive paper argued that the talmudic category of "human honour," which they translated as "human dignity," allowed for its abrogation. I argued that the category is entirely inapplicable to the case under discussion, even if we assumed that the prohibition is rabbinic and not biblical.

In almost all of the cases in which the category is invoked, the claim is that X may violate the law out of deference to the honour of Y. In the case under discussion, X is to be entitled to violate the law out of deference to his own honour, for which claim there is no real precedent.

What's more, such a claim is theologically weak, since no law-abiding Jew would ever entertain the possibility that his honour would supersede that of God. And in the few cases of application of the category which can possibly be understood to imply that X may violate the law out of deference to his own honour, X is always literally in a social context and in the presence of others.

For example, X may wear a hearing aid on Shabbat in the synagogue lest he be embarrassed by his inability to hear the Kaddish being recited and not answer the communal lines when the community does. In our case, there is no social context, since sexual relations are, by definition, private. Therefore, the category is inapplicable.

• How halachically defensible does an argument have to be before it can be considered within the halachic ballpark? We all understand and agree that decisors of Jewish law often approach the subject before them with a predisposition to give a specific answer. There's nothing wrong with that, in my opinion.

What, then, distinguishes a good decisor from a poor one?

The good decisor is able to judge his decision with enough dispassion to see whether his predisposition has blinded him to the indefensibility of his answer, and the poor one is not.

It is my opinion that my colleagues have here been blinded to the indefensibility of their conclusion. It is based on three pillars – I have not discussed one of them here – each of which is either quite clearly false or, at a minimum, is debatable.

For their conclusion to follow, however, all three must be considered as true and valid. This leads me to conclude that their decision was arrived at entirely independently of halachic reasoning, and that the defensibility of their after-the-fact reasoning was not relevant to them. The decision simply had to be as it was.

The combination of the above lead me to believe that the permissive position validated by the law committee was really outside the halachic framework, and I resigned from the committee.

The other side of the grave

Ghost Hunters, William James and the Search for Scientific Proof of Life After Death* by Deborah Blum, Penguin Press.

Books
Bernard Baskin

What does Judaism teach about spiritualism? Is it permissible to try to communicate with the dead? In Deuteronomy (18:10-12), there is a direct injunction against any such attempt.

The biblical account of the witch of En-dor, who brought to life the spirit of Samuel, remains a puzzle. It would appear that attendance at a séance is not expressly forbidden. But as Rabbi A. I. Kook (Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine) suggested in 1912: "The Jew who believes in the Lord, God of Life, should have no desire to pierce the veil and should be concerned with the duties of God and man on this side of the grave."

Spiritualism has been a flourishing belief for more than 150 years. From its noisy, melodramatic beginnings to its present mainly low-key manifestations, it has intrigued, baffled, convinced and comforted millions of people, while many others have dismissed it as utter nonsense

The book under review, by a professor of science and journalism at the University of Wisconsin, tells a fascinating many-sided story of how a group of distinguished personalities, British and American, launched a determined effort to investigate and explain instances of clairvoyance and ghostly visitations.

William James, the world-renowned psychologist, was joined in this effort by such unlikely "ghost hunters" as the co-discoverer of the theory of evolution, a physiologist from France who would win the Nobel Prize in medicine, an Australian who became a founding member of the American Anthropological Society, a female mathematician who became principal of Cambridge University's first college of women, a pioneer in British utilitarian philosophy and trio of respected physicists.

All of them believed that they were working toward an understanding of life that could help bridge the chasms between science and faith, between what people see and what they imagine.

James made it clear that even one instance of supernatural evidence was logically sufficient to prove the case for communication with the dead. As he put it, "To upset the conclusion that all crows are black, there is no need to seek demonstration that no crow is white; it is sufficient to produce one white crow; a single one is sufficient."

The author relates that the untiring investigators found themselves, as time went on, in hundreds of candlelit séance rooms with their elaborate "spirit cabinets," where glowing apparitions would appear and objects fly. What they mostly found, however, was fraud.

One medium, Leonara Piper, a respected Boston housewife, impressed James as having startling psychic abilities. He visited her in 1885, soon after the death of his one-year-old son. Although he never quite accepted that life after death was a reality, he was convinced, nonetheless, that only supernatural means could explain her astonishing knowledge of his family secrets.

About a decade ago, Martin Gardner, a writer in the field of popular science, in a debunking essay, explained how Mrs. Piper fooled the psychologist.

A mid-19th-century medium, D.D. Home, performed inexplicable marvellous feats. He was, he confidently said, a conduit, a messenger from the beyond. All psychic investigators acknowledge that he was never detected in fraud.

This riveting book is replete with ghost stories, strange happenings and striking characters. But it is also an extraordinary saga of how a group of earnest researchers staked their careers, their reputations – and even their sanity – in one of the most intriguing psychological quests ever undertaken. The knowledgeable author tells the story in a manner that is both entertaining and informative.

Tzedakah and your money

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

So many worthy causes. So little money.

You'll find many wonderful tzedakah organizations on the web. I couldn't possibly list even a fraction of them. Nor would I dare recommend one over another. However, I would like to examine a few sites with advice about how to give and what to look for in a well-run charity. Thankfully, there are a few people who research charities (many of them lesser known ones) and recommend those that are truly making a difference.

First, a few words of caution. Before you donate to any cause on the Internet, no matter how worthwhile, I strongly advise further investigation. If a charitable donation receipt is important to you, find out whether one is available before you give. Also, there is much debate about whether you should send a credit card donation online. If you are hesitant, no charity would turn down a donation by mail.

Just-Tzedakah.org is a great resource that has developed a set of voluntary standards for Jewish charities that go beyond the requirements of the American government. As well, there are a couple of downloadable documents that I recommend, especially "Smart Tzedakah: How to Evaluate Charities Before You Give" and "Principles of Ethics, Governance and Accountability for Jewish Philanthropies."

The second one takes traditional Jewish sources about tzedakah and applies them to the modern marketplace. For example, on the (sometimes controversial) issue of fundraising expenses, it looks to T'shuvot v'Hanhagot Yoreh De'ah. "The practice that the tzedakah solicitor takes a portion of the proceeds for himself is certainly permitted. That is for the benefit of the poor. If the collector did not receive compensation for his effort, there would be no solicitors… However, the donors don't intend that the majority should go to the collector." [www.just-tzedakah.org/bpb.pdf]

If you are unfamiliar with a charity, you may want to research its goals, its overhead and the amount of money it raises. All registered Canadian charities file documentation which can easily be retrieved from the Canada Revenue Agency website. You are supplied with the Registered Charity Information Return for up to six years where you will find information about a charity's goals, fundraising activities, paid staff and expenditures on compensation. When I typed in the word "Jewish" I got 228 matches; "Israel" had 126. Please note that the information in the database is provided by the charities themselves. [http://tinyurl.com/yz37ut]

In the United States, there's Guidestar, the National Database of Nonprofit Organizations, which allows to you search online for information about more than 1.5 million IRS-recognized nonprofits [www.guidestar.org] as well as the Internet Nonprofit Center. [www.idealist.org] To learn about Israeli charities, visit Giving Wisely: The Internet Directory of Israeli Nonprofit and Philanthropic Organizations. Unfortunately, this helpful resource doesn't seem to have been updated recently. [www.givingwisely.org.il/]

One of the most incredible advocates of tzedakah is mitzvah maven Danny Siegel. Siegel is based in Rockville, Md., and operates the Ziv Tzedakah Fund Inc. Siegel likes to proclaim his "Mitzvah Heroes" such as Elana Erdstein from Detroit, who requested and received for her bat mitzvah 25,000 hotel-size soaps, shampoos and conditioners to be given to the poor. [www.ziv.org/] Similar to Ziv, the Nebraska-based Kavod (dignity, honour) describes itself as a "non-profit tzedakah collective. We are a group of individuals who have chosen to pool our tzedakah resources together so that, as a community, we can have a greater impact in our efforts to repair the world." [http://kavod.org/]

Still looking for more information about how and where to give? Try these tzedakah links: Tzedaka.org [www.tzedaka.org] and Maven. [www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=172]

There may never be enough money for all the worthy institutions and individuals who deserve it. But Brandeis University Prof. Reuven Kimelman suggests that the recipient of the donation is not the only one who gains. "Tzedakah may not save us, but it makes us worth saving." [http://tinyurl.com/yk59d8]

Next time, you'll find out how you stack up against donors big and small.

שיעור בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

האופציה הסורית

ג'יימס ביקר, שר החוץ האמריקני לשעבר, פרסם בשבוע שעבר את מסקנות העדה שעמד בראשה בעניין עיראק והמזרח התיכון.

למרות שעיקר עבודתו נסבה סביב איך לצאת מעיראק, הוא גם גרס שעל ישראל וסוריה להכנס למשא ומתן, כמו גם שעל ארה"ב לשוחח עם איראן. בקיצור: יש לדבר עם כוחות הרשע, כי עם חברים טובים אין צורך לדבר.

במשך שנים התעקשה ישראל שהתנאי לשיחות עם סוריה הוא העדר תנאים מוקדמים-כלומר הסורים אינם יכולים לאמר: נשב רק אם תסכימו מראש להחזיר את כל הגולן. והיה עכשיו מכריזה סוריה חזור והכרז על נכונותה להידבר עם ישראל, אך ישראל מסרבת.

יתכן מאוד שהפוליטיקאים הישראלים פוחדים לפתוח מחדש את נושא רמת הגולן, שמא יפסידו מנדטים. אלא מה- הסקרים מצביעים דווקא שרוב תושבי ישראל היחודים מוכנים לעשת הרבה עבור שלום קבע. חוץ מזה הדיסיטנט של הממשלה הנוכחית ממילא שואף לאפס, על כן מעשה אמיץ כמו הידברות עם סוריה עשוי רק לעזור להם. אבל שישאר בינינו.

עצות לאוהבים

חברי שמחה הצליח להצחיק אותי במבחר אמרות כנף של אנשים מפורסמים. יד על הלב-לא כולם יכולים לראות דפוס, אבל כמה וכמה דוקא בסדר אפילו לכמה זה:

"אנשים חושבים בטעות שהם מפסיקים להתאהב בוקנתם, מבלי לדעת שמדקנים ברגע שמפסיקים לאהוב" (נאדיה מאדקס)

"להתווכח עם אשה זה כמו לנסות לקרוא עיתון נגד הרוח" (דוסטויבסקי)

"אל תתחתני עם מישהו כדי להחזירו למוטב בשביל זה יש בתי סוהר". (מיי וסט)

"נישואים זו ברית בין שני אנשים, אחד מהם שמעולם לא יוכר ימי הולדת, והשניה שלעולם לא תשכח אותם" (אדן נאש)

"לפעמים אתה פוגש מישהו ובטוח שהייתם נאהבים בגלגול הקודם. אחרי שבועיים ביחד, אתה מבין למה לא שמרת איתה על קשר במשך אלפיים שנה" (וודי אלן)

"יצאתי לכל כך הרבה פגישות עיוורות, שמגיע לי כלב נחייה חינם".

Migdal Ohr helps Israeli children in need

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Thousands of children from impoverished and disadvantaged homes, many of them orphans, have found shelter, safety and love at Migdal Ohr (Tower of Light) in the Galilee, thanks to a rabbi who had the vision and determination to protect and educate them.

In the early 1970s, Rabbi Yitzchak Dovid Grossman visited discotheques and pubs in Migdal Ha'Emek, a town in northern Israel. He engaged the young people in dialogue and realized that many of them were on drugs and needed help.

The rabbi invited 18 students, regardless of their religious or political beliefs, to come to study with him in the new school of Migdal Ohr, where his school of the same name is located. Today, the campus is a 1½-hour drive north of Jerusalem on the new Road 6. It extends over an area of 650,000 square feet and has a student body of 7,000 boys and girls.

There are 800 paid staff – administrators, educators, physicians, nurses and key industrial personnel. More than 60 per cent of them are Migdal Ohr graduates.

Rabbi Grossman, who has been called the father of 7,000 and the Disco Rabbi, is a sixth-generation Jerusalemite, born in 1946. He moved to the Lower Galilee in 1968, and soon after that, he began providing socio-humanitarian aid.

For his efforts, Rabbi Grossman recently received the prestigious Israel Prize, the first Orthodox Jew to be honoured with this annual award presented by the State of Israel. Recipients of the Israel Prize can be individuals or groups that have demonstrated excellence or broken new ground in a certain field.

In recent years, he has been asked to serve as chief rabbi of Israel, but he has refused, saying that the children at Migdal Ohr need him.

Rabbi Grossman, founder and dean of Migdal Ohr, was in Toronto recently at a reception and Israeli art exhibit curated by Toronto's Art & Soul Fine Art. The evening was co-chaired by volunteers Deborah Cohen, Rhona Slomovic and Renee Rosenzweig.

The rabbi told the 180 supporters at the event that some 1,800 new immigrants from the former U.S.S.R., Yemen, Ethiopia and other underdeveloped countries recently came to Migdal Ohr, which, he said, is like a city within a city. The campus has schools from nursery to secondary level, day-care centres and immigrant absorption activities.

He noted that many immigrants came from North African countries and the area was once one of the prime centres of criminal activities in Israel, but "today, the crime rate is down 90 per cent in the Galilee.

"If not for Migdal Ohr, many of these children would have been in jail or on drugs. They could destroy Israel, and Migdal Ohr saves these kids," Rabbi Grossman said in an interview.

The Migdal Ohr Educational Center has a budget of $25 million (US), 70 per cent from the government and 30 per cent from donations from all over the world, he said. A medical centre for children is now being built on the campus.

Chuck Roniak of Montreal, the national president of Canadian Friends of Migdal Ohr, spoke of the work the rabbi has done with prisoners. In conjunction with the Israel Prisons Authority, Rabbi Grossman established a prisoner rehabilitation centre, where Torah and vocational studies are taught in preparation for the return to life outside prison wall. Migdal Ohr has also established a foster family village for children too young to be placed in a dormitory setting, and a nationwide youth club network that serves 2,500 immigrant children in about 60 locations in Israel.

Roniak said that recently an orphanage closed in the Ukraine because there were not enough resources.

"The rabbi created a model program [at Migdal Ohr] for the 320 orphaned babies. He got donations from two Canadians for two large buildings with 160 apartments in each building and began a Rent for Care project. You get a free apartment if you take care of a baby. There are four supervisors in each building."

In this way, Roniak said, all the babies are being taken care of.

"Rabbi Grossman looks at a problem and says why can't I do something? And he does."

On Campus

Stand up for your beliefs in support of Israel

By ADAM HUMMEL
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Israel is an apartheid state. Zionism is racism. Hillel is a racist organization. Israel used 90,000 European troops to help win the War of Independence. Apartheid was created by the Jewish colonial state. Hillel is unfit for hosting Holocaust Education Week on campus. Israel is perpetrating genocide against the Palestinians.

Tough to read? Imagine hearing this on a regular basis.

Almost daily, one can witness some form of anti-Israel sentiment on campus at York University, and this one-sided attack on Israel has opened a new front on the conflict in the Middle East. We, as Jewish students at York, are standing on the front line of a conflict that has different consequences from those in the fighting actually unfolding in the region. This conflict has the ability to reach those students who have no bias in the clash and alter their beliefs by using fabricated information. It also, in its simplest form, is making Jewish students uncomfortable on campus.

The activists disseminating the false information are not pro-Palestinian, they are anti-Israel. Though these are groups that call themselves Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), the Palestine Solidarity Committee (PSC), and even the Arab Student Collective (ASC), they do little to promote the Palestinian cause. They exist for one reason: to criticize and smear the name of Israel and Zionism on campus.

It is important to have people understand Hillel's simple stance on the conflict, one which stands in stark opposition to the above: we will not criticize the Palestinians. Our advocacy is strictly about Israel and expresses our determination to have peace in the region. We also call for dialogue on campus. This view enables us to gain more credibility than we would have by simply picking on a people who don't need to be picked on.

The smear campaign against Israel on campus is far-reaching, and is not exclusive to York. However, as a result of campus politics, the student government and the lack of action on behalf of the administration to stop such demonstrations, the anti-Israel rhetoric has thrived and increased on campus virtually unopposed.

This culture of hate is found all over the university, from the school newspaper, to the classroom, to the public spaces.

Almost every day for the past two months, there has been a table in Vari Hall, the centre of the university, devoted to slandering Israel in some way.

At times, one can even find a makeshift "apartheid wall," supposed to be imitating the security fence that Israel has erected to stop terrorists from killing innocents. This wall also serves as a propaganda hub, with descriptions of apartheid as a "creation of the Jewish colonial state," making no mention of South Africa whatsoever. On occasion, there is even a call to "Globalize the intifadah."

The York Federation of Students (YFS) attempted to create a Stop the Hate Campaign in October, supposed to be a year-long campaign to – you guessed it – stop the hate. Unfortunately, even at the launch of the campaign when every group had a chance to speak about its organization and how it will stop the hate, Israel was slandered twice in one hour.

One student did a rap, turning his "poetry" into a hateful verse about the IDF as a killing machine.

After the YFS apologized for allowing this, the head of the ASC stood up and spoke about the evils of Israel, saying that support for Israeli "apartheid" had even made it to campus. This, of course, involved numerous references to the supporters of Israel as supporters of "the devil," and the declaration that the Jewish National Fund is a colonialist organization. Welcome to York.

Their outright denial of the facts even leads some people to state that there are no Muslim countries in the world. This is done to discredit the Jewish state, but anyone can tell you that the Islamic Republics of Iran and Pakistan are quite legitimate Muslim states.

This outpouring of hatred continues unabated. The activists are daily engaging students who have nothing invested in the conflict to win them over to their side.

Jewish students and all those who support Israel must stand strong for their beliefs and learn the facts. This is the most important thing that can be done, and advocacy needs to be increased in Jewish day schools and advocacy programs.

York is an extreme example of a university campus and the way politics unfolds among students, but it is also a model for the modern world, which also consistently rallies against Israel.

To the students of every university: be proud of your Zionism and your support for Israel. It is the only democracy in the Middle East and a country that, though it may have some flaws, is doing the right thing. Don't let politics stand in the way of your support for this country, and never take for granted all the work that Jewish communities have done to make Israel what it is today.

We are fighting a war on two fronts: in the Middle East and on our campuses. Though the situation in the Middle East certainly does not look as though it's moving anywhere, I truly believe we have the ability to make progress on campus. Let's stand up for what we believe in, expose the truth, and be proud of our country.

Adam Hummel is the president of Hillel at York University.

Ex-IDF soldier says he's 'breaking the silence'

By LISA VARANO
Special to The CJN

Yehuda Shaul had what he calls an "enlightenment moment" shortly before his required military service in the Israeli army ended.

He said he stopped thinking as a soldier and asked himself what kind of civilian life he wanted to lead.

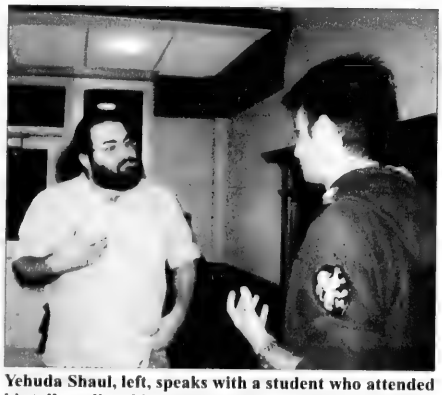
The moment of self-reflection sparked a moral crisis in his life, he told some 50 people at the University of Western Ontario earlier this month.

"In one second, military terminology and military way of thinking doesn't apply to you any more, so you find yourself losing justification for 90 per cent of the actions that you took part in," he said. "Suddenly, I saw a different face. Suddenly, you saw horns on my head."

Shaul, 24, said that serving in the Palestinian territories, including for 14 months in Hebron, made him lose his sense of right and wrong.

"At the first moment that you come as a combat soldier in the occupied territories, it's like taking all your ideology, all your morality, putting it in a blender, turning it on for one minute and there's nothing left afterward," he said.

When he discovered that other soldiers felt the same way, he co-founded a group in 2004 called Breaking the Silence. The project began with an exhibit of photographs that soldiers took during their service. It attracted 7,000 visitors and was shown in the Knesset.



Yehuda Shaul, left, speaks with a student who attended his talk earlier this month at the University of Western Ontario. [Lisa Varano photo]

Some of the pictures show soldiers posing as they would in vacation snapshots. For example, one photo shows soldiers in uniform watching a World Cup soccer match in a Palestinian home they were occupying for military reasons.

It is against the Israeli army's strict moral code to use Palestinians' property unless it is necessary, Shaul said, but soldiers soon become numb and do it anyway.

> 'We gather together because we believe in the same problem'

Breaking the Silence has collected testimonials from 400 former Israeli soldiers to date, he said.

"We all gather together not because we have the same political agenda [or] because we believe in the same solution," he said. "We gather together because we believe in the same problem."

Speaking to critics who say that the Israeli Defence Forces is the most moral army in the world is like speaking to himself prior to his "enlightenment," said Shaul, who was born in Jerusalem to a Canadian father.

"For me, it's very simple. I see the work of Breaking the Silence as a way of taking responsibility," he said.

Shaul said he wants people to define their moral boundaries and refuse to act in ways that go beyond them.

Shaul's speech was organized by the Centre for Social Concern at King's University College, a Catholic college that's part of UWO. The centre's website says it aims "to bring issues of poverty, inequality, and other forms of injustice under the scrutiny of social analysis."

Organizer Jeff Buchanan, a King's student, said he hoped Shaul's speech would encourage people to think critically. "I see this speaker as… just another voice, to give another perspective on what's happened, to allow people to get a fuller sense of what's actually happening over there," he said.

Liora Santopinto, a King's student who attended the talk, said Shaul expressed himself honestly.

"I felt that he wasn't holding anything back," she said. "He spoke to us clearly, to break his silence – exactly as he said."

Former Israeli wins Waldman scholarship

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It was only four years ago that Fiana Kalp arrived in Toronto from Israel, speaking broken English and being weeks away from starting her first year at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Today, the 18-year-old CHAT graduate is the latest recipient of the Dennis Waldman Foundation for Jewish Education award.

The foundation was established after Dennis Waldman, a former Hebrew school teacher, died suddenly in 1989 at age 41.

His family and friends established a trust in his honour to contribute to the education of Jewish youth in the community.

Fiana Kalp

Every year, the non-profit organization awards a $2,500 scholarship to a student who has completed high school and is continuing on to post-secondary education.

This year, the Russian-born Kalp, who graduated from CHAT with an academic average of almost 90 per cent, won the scholarship.

To qualify, each student must complete an application that includes an essay, proof of academic achievement, teacher references and a list of extracurricular activities, and demonstrates involvement in the Jewish community.

Kalp, who is in her first year at York University studying psychology and has ambitions to specialize in abnormal child psychology, impressed the foundation's board of directors with an application that highlighted her many accomplishments.

"I've been volunteering at the [Bathurst Jewish Community Centre]– I helped throw all the holiday parties and celebrations. I also teach Hebrew at Temple Sinai. I do special education one-on-one," Kalp said.

Kalp was also the editor of CHAT's Hebrew newspaper and part of the school's Israeli affairs committee. She also worked as a camp counsellor for disabled children at the BJCC.

"Volunteering makes me feel back at home, because I meet a lot of Israelis, and Jewish people are all alike, so it feels comfortable and familiar," Kalp said.

"It's important to me to feel a part of the Jewish community. It's hard to just break away from it."

While Kalp's accomplishments make her deserving of the award, she's still grateful for the gift, which has helped her and her family ease the financial burden of post-secondary tuition.

"I've always wanted to go to school and it's great that there are people who are supporting me and helping me out with this," she said.

"My family can use all the help they can get, so it was just so great to get the award for just doing something that I love. It is nice to be recognized."

For more information about the award, visit www.waldmanfoundation.org.

UJA FEDERATION ISRAEL EMERGENCY CAMPAIGN 2007

$81 million:

While Israel faced one of her darkest moments this past summer, the Toronto Jewish community led the way with its immediate response and extraordinary generosity.

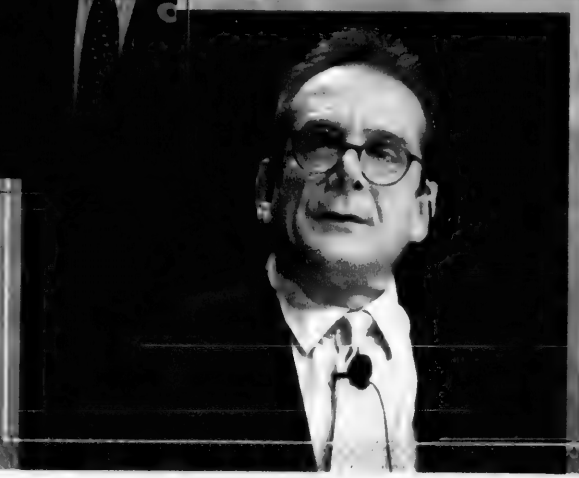
UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 raised $81 million with $20 million designated for Israel's emergency needs. Our funding provided:

- Recreation, relief and respite for northern Israeli citizens
- New equipment for schools and other facilities destroyed by katyusha rockets
- Summer camps away from the war zone for northern Israeli children
- Funding for direct trauma services

Campers from Camp Ramah hand out flags at the community-wide Stand with Israel rally, where thousands came out in support of Israel during the war against Hezbollah.

Telethon volunteers, including Josh Shuval and Evelyn Sagal, made the call on behalf of UJA Federation and raised $5.6 million over the course of four months.

Major Gifts dinner keynote speaker, Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay (centre), with event co-chairs Jill Reitman & Ted Saskin.



Pulitzer Prize winning author Dr. Charles Krauthammer addresses more than 2000 people at UJA's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 launch in August.

You made it happen. Thank You!

Canadian rabbis take message to Parliament Hill

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Nineteen rabbis – including Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist clergy – from the newly formed Canadian Rabbinic Caucus (CRC) gathered in Ottawa earlier this month to meet with politicians on Parliament Hill.

The rabbis – male and female, anglophone and francophone – travelled from Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Kingston and Halifax to announce the establishment of the CRC, which was formed by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) in response to the rising worldwide tendency to use religion as an excusé to justify violence, and with the goal of offering a religious, Jewish perspective on a variety of issues.

The rabbis met with representatives of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, and with MPs of various parties. They also had lunch with the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group, which includes MPs and senators from all parties, and attended question period in the House of Commons.

As well, they met with Prime Minister Stephen Harper, to whom Rabbi Reuven Bulka, CRC co-chair and spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, presented a plaque engraved with a prayer for Canada in both French and English.

"Meeting with the prime minister was a very powerful moment," said Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, spiritual leader of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Montreal and a co-chair of the CRC.

"I had been in Israel a week-and-a-half earlier and had met with [Israeli] Prime Minister [Ehud] Olmert. [I was] able to tell [Harper] that Olmert praised his vision and said he would love to have him visit Israel."

The rabbis were recognized in the House of Commons by James Lunney, the Tory MP for Nanaimo-Alberni, and by Liberal Anita Neville, a MP for Winnipeg South Centre.

"The rabbinic caucus has embraced a hope shared by many Canadians that Canada, as an open, pluralistic, democratic and diverse society might aspire to be the country that offers guidance and inspiration to the world in the 21st century," Lunney said.

"Today, these rabbis will call on leaders of other faith groups to denounce the killings of innocent civilians in the name of deity," Neville said. "They will also ask other religious leaders to join them in promoting an open dialogue so the different perspectives on issues can be debated in an open, respectful and trustworthy manner."

Rabbi Steinmetz, Rabbi Bulka and fellow co-chair Rabbi Reuben Poupko, spiritual leader of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation in Montreal, all said they were extremely pleased with the first CRC gathering.

"It was a wonderful inauguration for the CRC, and I hope that we will be able to follow through in a significant way," Rabbi Poupko said. "There are so many disturbing elements in the past decade. We want to emphasize the positive role religion can play."

"I think that there was a unique sense of respect for the rabbis that we felt," Rabbi Steinmetz said. "We have to give voice to our views, because we are not just speaking from a political level, but from a powerful moral level."

Rabbi Bulka agreed: "It was clear that the parliamentarians greatly appreciated this initiative to use religion as a healing and uniting presence in Canada."

The CRC plans to continue to meet and to expand its reach, both by enlisting other rabbis and by meeting with provincial governments across the country.

"And then we will regroup and meet again in Ottawa to continue in the way we started," Rabbi Poupko said.

First Canadian elected to head BB International

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For the first time in its163-year history, B'nai Brith International (BBI) has elected a non-U.S. citizen as its president – Ottawa native Moishe Smith.

Smith, a local restaurateur, was inaugurated at the Jewish service organization's annual policy conference in New Orleans earlier this month and will serve as president until 2009.

Smith's involvement with B'nai Brith goes back to his high school days as a member of the fraternity AZA. He later joined Ottawa's Parliament Lodge No. 2159, taking on a variety of positions in the chapter.

"I ended up being appointed to the national board in Canada and within five or six years became president of B'nai Brith Canada," he said, adding that all this happened before he was even 40 years old.

In 1986, Smith received the Young Leadership Award from B'nai Brith International and soon thereafter was appointed to the international board of governors.

"I had no idea when I started that it would lead to this," Smith said. "I have worked very, very hard for the organization over the years, and I am very excited and humbled that B'nai Brith International chose me as the first non-American president."

Two of Smith's sisters attended the conference in New Orleans to share in the excitement of his inauguration. About a dozen other Canadians were there as well, including several past presidents of B'nai Brith Canada.

B'nai Brith was founded in 1843 in New York as an organization to help Jewish immigrants. It now has more than 180,000 members in more than 50 countries, and it's involved in human rights and goodwill efforts aimed at both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities around the world.

"BBI was doing business in the U.S. before Kiwanis, before Rotary, before there were any hospital foundations, or Red Cross," said Smith. "BBI built the infrastructure and was the fabric of the Jewish communities in the small towns as well as the big cities."

Smith will be doing a great deal of travelling during his tenure as president.

"I will travel as the need arises. Members in more than 50 countries around the world will feel well looked after," he said. "We will continue our work internationally… in Latin America, in Europe, to continue to fight anti-Semitism and to ensure the rights and freedoms for all mankind."

Two issues are at the forefront of Smith's agenda. The first is reforming the United Nations.

"[The UN's human rights] commission got a new name, but the constant Israel-bashing continues," he said.

Smith said that he also plans "to educate, embrace, empower and engage the next generation of Jewish activists so that they understand the issues and can be active participants in the protection of Israel and human rights."

Sephardi school launches program for English speakers

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — A one-year Judaic studies leadership program for English-speaking post-high school students has been launched at the Sephardic Educational Center in Jerusalem's Jewish quarter.

Although the program focuses on Sephardi Jewish history, it is open to Ashkenazi Jewish students as well.

It "is designed to appeal to students who want more religious studies than they might get at the Hebrew University's Rothberg school for overseas students, but less religious studies than at a yeshiva," said Rabbi Joseph Benarroch, a teacher at the centre who stopped in Winnipeg in early December to promote the program.

Classes will combine academics with opportunities to "live and breathe" the subject matter, he said. There will be Shabbatons, opportunities to visit archeological sites, volunteer projects and interactions with Israeli society.

"One of the big attractions of this program is that students will be able to live right in the heart of the Jewish quarter," Rabbi Benarroch said. "They will be able to experience the pulse of living in the Old City."

The Judaic studies leadership program will accept 20 overseas students and combines five different areas of teaching: Judaic studies; the history and politics of Israel; leadership training; Sephardi history, culture and customs; and the history of Jerusalem. As well, students will be required to attend a Hebrew ulpan.

Students taking the program, however, will not be eligible to obtain any university credits, "but that is something that we are working on to change in the future," Rabbi Benarroch said.

The program, including accommodation and two daily meals, costs $7,000 (US), and students can apply for a Masa scholarship from the Jewish Agency for the whole amount.

Rabbi Benarroch, who was born and raised in Winnipeg, moved to Israel eight years ago and now lives in Efrat, a settlement just outside of Jerusalem. Before moving to Israel, he served as the rabbi of Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Benarroch also promoted the Sephardic Educational Center's (SEC) Judaic studies leadership program in Toronto and Montreal. He planned to visit Los Angeles, New York and Washington, D.C., as well.

"I've been getting a good response to the program. In Montreal, there is a large Sephardic Jewish community, and there are already some students who are interested in registering for it," he said.

Founded in 1979, the SEC is housed in historic buildings that originally belonged to the Sephardi Jewish community. "At the centre, we run short-term birthright programs and Shabbatons for English-speaking students in Jerusalem, as well as providing weekly [Judaic] classes in English, Spanish and French," Rabbi Benarroch said.

"We also run special tours of the Old City. Our tours focus on the history of the Sephardic Jews in the Old City. The history of Sephardic Jews is the history of Jerusalem, from approximately the year 1500. The first immigration of Ashkenazi Jews to Jerusalem wasn't until the mid-1800s."

Rabbi Benarroch starts his tours of the old city at the synagogue built by the Ramban (Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman, known as Nachmanides) in 1267. "Ramban's synagogue, which is 740 years old, is the oldest active synagogue that I know of in the world," he said.

For more information about the Judaic studies leadership program at the SEC, e-mail Rabbi Benarroch at sepheduc@netvision.net.il.

Survey sheds light on interfaith couples raising kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Among interfaith families raising Jewish children, a key way to resolve the "December dilemma" is to take part in both Christmas and Chanukah celebrations by treating Chanukah as a religious holiday and Christmas as a secular one, a new survey says.

The Newton, Mass.-based website InterfaithFamily.com, which describes itself as "encouraging Jewish choices and a welcoming Jewish community," received replies to its third annual December holidays survey from 759 people, 342 of whom said they were interfaith couples raising (or having raised) their children as Jews. Most of these couples are in their 30s and 40s and have children age 10 and under.

"I think it's really important for Jews and Jewish leaders to understand what the behaviour of interfaith families raising their children as Jews looks like," said Edmund Case, president of InterfaithFamily.com, explaining the motivation behind the survey. He added that Jewish leaders also need to understand that families "can participate in Christmas celebrations and children won't [necessarily] turn out to not be Jewish."

The majority of survey respondents were American, but a dozen identified themselves as being from Canada, Case said.

Roberta Calderone, a social worker who facilitates an interfaith marriage preparation program at Montreal's Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, was one of the Canadian respondents. She has been married to Carman, a non-practising Catholic, for the past 38 years.

"Our commitment and contract to each other was that we were going to have a Jewish home and Jewish children, but we certainly didn't exclude his family," Calderone told The CJN. They have a 34-year-old daughter, who is married to a Jewish man, and a 31-year-old son, whose wife converted to Judaism under the auspices of the Conservative movement.

Over the years, the family has always had Chanukah celebrations at home. Christmas was celebrated with Carman's family at their home, where the children received Christmas presents from their non-Jewish relatives.

"It was a fun highlight of their life," said Calderone. "They knew it wasn't for them, but it was something they participated in."

'You can participate in another culture's celebrations without becoming their religion or taking their identity'

She said the arrangement was not confusing for her children, who attended Hebrew school and had their bar and bat mitzvahs at the temple.

For members of her interfaith group, a prominent issue is "why not [have a] Christmas tree," which is often seen as a non-religious symbol and a source of warm memories for non-Jews, and sometimes also by their Jewish partners.

But from a "synagogue point of view," Calderone said, a tree indicates Christian people celebrating Christmas.

In an op-ed piece in the Forward newspaper last month, Case and co-author Kathy Kahn of the Union for Reform Judaism, argued that successful outreach can result in a majority of interfaith families "making Jewish choices."

They cited a recent study on Boston's Jewish community – which has an estimated intermarriage rate of 37 per cent – that indicated 60 per cent of children in intermarried households are being raised as Jews, almost double the national American rate of 33 per cent. Case and Kahn attribute the difference to outreach, a priority for the Boston Jewish federation since 1998.

"The problem I have is that there are leading people in the Jewish community who think intermarriage is an awful thing and outreach is a waste of time," Case told The CJN.

Some of the survey responses shed light on how interfaith families think about the December holidays.

"Our children know they are Jews – you can participate in another culture's celebrations without becoming their religion or taking their identity," said one respondent.

"We celebrate Shabbat once a week, so I don't think one evening of opening Christmas gifts will undermine all of the other Jewish celebrations we have throughout the year."

That opinion came from among the 75 per cent of respondents who did not think that celebrating Christmas would affect their children's Jewish identity. Twenty-five per cent disagreed with than sentiment, and one said it was "the major issue I am struggling over."

A handful said that celebrating both holidays actually strengthens their children's Jewish identity.

"[My children] love showing their Christian cousins how to light a menorah, and what it means and commemorates," one person wrote.

However, 75 per cent agreed that "Chrismukkah" – the blended holiday popularized by the television program The OC – is a bad idea.

Linda Hooper's speech "The Power of One," tells the moving story of how the students behind the Paper Clips Project responded to what had been to them a completely unfamiliar chapter in human history — the Holocaust. In 1998, inspired by their principal, the children of rural Tennessee's Whitwell Middle School took on an extraordinary project. Struggling to grasp the concept of six million Holocaust victims, the students decided to collect six million paper clips to better understand the extent of this crime against humanity. This amazing project changed the students, their teachers, their families and the entire town forever... and eventually opened hearts and minds around the world as this remarkable story became an award-winning film entitled Paper Clips.

It's all Israel's fault

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Iraq Study Group report on Dec. 6 tried to link resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to the struggles in Iraq and Afghanistan. Soon after, arguments from journalists and pundits supporting such a linkage (either implicitly or explicitly) picked up steam. But so did counter-arguments that attempted to show the flaws in the theory. In fact, they abounded.

For instance, in the Dec.7 Globe and Mail ("Iraq report requires reality check"), Israeli analyst Barry Rubin argued that while finding a diplomatic solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict in the hope of easing the Iraq situation "sounds very nice," it fails to face a harsh reality: "Given the Hamas leadership of the Palestinian Authority, the incompetence of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, and the total chaos in Palestinian politics, this is all so much cosmetic surgery."

The Globe itself agreed with Rubin, editorializing the same day ("Talking sense on Iraq") that the Iraq Study Group "fails to spell out" how a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict can be achieved, "since Palestinians have a government dedicated to the destruction of Israel, and since any concessions Israel could reasonably offer understandably fall far short of that."

Indeed, as David Frum wrote ("Why is it always about Israel?," National Post, Dec. 9): "If pure force of repetition could make a statement true, then the 'centrality' of the Palestinian issue to the Iraq conflict would rank up there with Newton's laws. But before our brains are battered into acquiescence, can we request an explanation of how this relationship between the Palestinians and Iraq is supposed to work?"

Murderous animosity between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq and provocations by Holocaust-denying, virulently anti-Israeli Iran (arguably the most dominant force in Iraq today) are not going to be mollified by progress on the Israeli-Palestinian front.

Frum pointed out that it's not the failure to solve the Israel-Palestinian conflict that "inflames and radicalizes the Middle East" but Arab radicalism itself that is the "cause of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute" in the first place.

"There is no peace because Israel's neighbours – and too many of the world's Muslims – cannot accept the right of a non-Arab, non-Muslim minority to live unsubjugated in the Middle East. That is the true 'core' of the dispute, and it cannot be fixed by negotiation."

Another reporter, Lisa Beyer, long experienced in covering the Middle East, called the linkage idea "a corrosive myth" ("The Big Lie about the Middle East," Time, Dec. 10).

She wrote: "To promote the canard that the troubles of the Arab world are rooted in the Palestinians' misfortunes does great harm. It encourages the Arabs to continue to avoid addressing the colossal societal and political ills by hiding behind the Great Excuse: it's all Israel's fault."

A couple of weeks ago, on TVO's The Agenda, Eric Margolis stated, absurdly, that Hamas' recognition of Israel is contingent upon Israel's recognition of the Palestinians (see "According to Reports," Nov. 30).

On the Dec. 6 show, Margolis was back with another twisted account of reality. This time, he insisted that UN Security Council Resolution 242 (the basis of Arab-Israeli peacemaking since 1967) "calls for a two-state solution based on the 1967 border lines, which means that the Palestinian state would regain the Old City of Jerusalem."

Wrong! Constructed in the aftermath of the 1967 war, Resolution 242 envisions Israel's withdrawal from territory previously controlled by Egypt, Jordan and Syria in exchange for real peace and security, but not going back to the precise and indefensible "Green Line." It says nothing about a two-state solution with the Palestinians. In any event, there has never been a "Palestinian state" that could "regain" the Old City. (Host Steve Paikin and co-panelist Janice Stein attempted to correct Margolis, but they only partially succeeded.)

While Israel supports a two-state solution with the Palestinians (based on territorial compromise), and while Resolution 242 in general underpins this support, it's still not correct to say that 242 explicitly calls for the solution that Margolis describes.

TVO viewers need to be wary of Margolis' pronouncements on Israel. It's not his ideological viewpoint that's in question – it's his competence.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Israeli high schoolers describe war experiences

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Over the past five years, under the auspices of the Jewish Agency-sponsored Partnership 2000 (P2K) program, Gray Academy of Jewish Education in Winnipeg and Danciger High School in Kiryat Shmonah in northen Israel have been conducting teacher-student exchange programs.

This year, a group of Danciger students and teachers came to Winnipeg from Nov. 26 to Dec. 6 and took part in a variety of activities over the course of their stay. This year, though, the visit was overshadowed by the events of the past summer in northern Israel.

On Nov. 29, at an evening co-sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the Combined Jewish Appeal (that provides some of the funding for the P2K program), the Partnership 2000 committee and Gray Academy, Kiryat Shmonah students Atalia Amasay, Shir Tal, Shunit Neeman, Liron Ben Shoshan, Einat Azulay and Sol Azor all spoke about how they spent their summer holidays.

All of the girls – and most of their immediate family members – relocated to more southern areas of Israel, far removed from the constant shelling by Hezbollah.

All spoke of boredom and of anxiety about friends and family members who stayed behind in Kiryat Shmonah. When they were able to return home, they were fortunate to find that their homes weren't damaged.

Their school, however, was hit by three rockets. One damaged the entrance and two more hit the school itself. There were about 100 people in the building when the third rocket struck. Fortunately, no one inside at the time was injured, and the school was repaired in time for the start of the new school year.

As part of the evening, the Gray Academy student council P2K committee presented the visiting students with $2,800 that Gray students raised to build a garden at the restored Danciger entrance.

Those attending the evening were also shown a video featuring interviews with Danciger students and teachers. One student spoke about losing her brother in the fighting in Lebanon. One of the teachers recalled the terror she felt as a girl growing up in Kiryat Shmonah because of frequent rocket barrages emanating from Lebanon and how the current conflict reawakened those fears.

In his remarks, P2K committee chair Marty Greenfield said the program is bigger than just Gray Academy and Danciger High School. The partnership – inaugurated in 1997 – links six Canadian Jewish communities (Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa and the Atlantic region) with the five municipalities – with a total population of about 50,000 – in Israel's Galilee Panhandle.

P2K involves a variety of programs aimed at strengthening Jewish values and fostering a connection between elementary and high school students and teachers in the Galilee and in Canada, he said.

This is done through educational projects, video conferencing and reciprocal visits. The exchange program, he said, is the template that other smaller Jewish communities across Canada are looking to in starting similar exchange programs.

Speaking for Gray Academy's student council Y2K committee and students who have been to Danciger, David Coodin, the committee co-chair, described the difference it makes for Gray Academy students to be able to put names and faces to all that they have learned about Israel during their school years.

"By being able to hang out with Israeli teenagers and their families, we got a sense of the real Israel," Coodin said. "It was a life experience."

He also spoke about his visit to Israel last year with other Gray Academy students, calling it a confidence booster that has led them to take on leadership roles in the school and the wider community.

As a result of the experience, he added, a few Gray Academy graduates and students have made aliyah.

The next group of Gray Academy students to visit Kiryat Shmonah and Danciger High School are scheduled to depart in April.

Greenfield noted that the visiting Danciger students also toured an aboriginal high school. "It's important to have the students interact with non-Jewish high school students, too," he said. "We want to show the general public that Israeli teens are the same as Canadian teens."

Ian Goldstine, this year's CJA campaign chair, concluded the evening with an update on the campaign. He reported that the main campaign has surpassed $4.5 million, including close to $1 million raised by the CJA Women's campaign, and that the community's Crisis Fund for Israel, which was launched in the summer, stands at $2,272,000.

Abbas stares down Hamas; calls for early election

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — For Palestinians, the choices now seem stark: radical reform or civil war.

After months of prevaricating while the Palestinian Authority nose-dived into poverty and violence, Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas finally confronted his Hamas rivals by calling new elections, in the hope of changing the government.

"We should not continue in a vicious circle while life breaks down," Abbas said in a long-awaited speech last Saturday. "We'll go back to the people and let the people decide."

Though Abbas was, in principle, invoking an executive privilege, Hamas accused him of seeking to topple its nine-month-old administration with the West's blessing.

"This is a real coup against the democratically elected government," said Mushir Masri, a lawmaker with the Islamic terrorist group. Hamas was elected last January and took office in March, prompting a cut-off of western aid.

Abbas didn't set a date for new elections, and it's not clear exactly how the process would proceed, as PA law is vague on electoral procedures. Hamas claimed Abbas was free to resign as president but had no authority to call new parliamentary elections.

Fighting quickly flared after Abbas' announcement. In the Gaza Strip, shots were fired at the convoys of the PA prime minister and foreign minister, both of them Hamas leaders, and gunmen killed an Abbas bodyguard in a separate incident. U.S.-trained security forces loyal to Abbas fanned out around government buildings.

In the streets of the West Bank, there were violent scuffles between Hamas loyalists and supporters of Abbas' Fatah faction.

In Jerusalem and western capitals, the whirlwind developments drew mixed reactions.

While no one was upset to see Hamas under pressure, neither was the prospect of intra-Palestinian bloodshed welcomed. Even if new elections – anticipated in mid-2007 – are held peacefully, there is no guarantee that Hamas won't be re-elected. That surely would sound Fatah's death knell and confirm that the Palestinians are irrevocably taking a radical road.

The Israeli government, which has long called on Abbas to honour his international commitments by cracking down on Hamas and other Palestinian terrorist groups, fell silent Sunday. Political sources said Prime Minister Ehud Olmert had ordered his cabinet colleagues to keep mum on the PA crisis.

That decision won rare praise from Ahmed Tibi, an Israeli Arab lawmaker and confidant of top Fatah officials. Any overt Israeli action to help Abbas "would only weaken Fatah," Tibi told Army Radio in an interview.

While he voiced worry about the violence in the West Bank and Gaza, Tibi predicted that Abbas would try to leverage the threat of new elections into talks that would prod Hamas toward compromise.

But Hamas has proven resilient, weathering a western aid blockade on the PA and refusing to accommodate international demands that the Palestinian government recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce terrorism and honour past PA commitments.

The United States was less reticent than Israel about the PA crisis.

"While the elections are an internal matter, we hope this helps bring the violence to an end and the formation of a Palestinian Authority committed to the Quartet principles," White House spokesperson Jeanie Mamo said. The Quartet is a diplomatic grouping of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations that's guiding the "road map" peace plan.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who was due to arrive later Sunday for a troubleshooting visit to Israel and the PA, spoke in Abbas' defence.

"This is the moment for the international community to come behind him, to help build his authority and his capability, to deliver improvements in the living standards of the Palestinian people, but also in the progress that we all want to see on resolving the Israel-Palestinian issue," Blair said.

"Hamas at the present time is not prepared to be constructive," he said. "I think he [Abbas] is serious about elections."

Carter rift seems irreparable

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — For Jimmy Carter, a meeting with a group of Phoenix-area rabbis was the high point of his tour to promote Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, a new book in which the former U.S. president blames Israel for the absence of Mideast peace.

For members of the Phoenix Board of Rabbis' executive committee, who hoped a face-to-face meeting could help repair Carter's relationship with the Jewish community, the Dec. 12 encounter was a disappointment.

"As a Jewish community, we have had a great deal of respect over the years for the human rights work you have done and your commitment to the peace process," Rabbi Andrew Straus told JTA, describing the group's message to Carter. "But your new book has hurt our relationship with you and hurt our understanding of who you are and what you're trying to do."

The meeting, which lasted more than an hour, was described as cordial and respectful, but the rabbis left disheartened.

Carter claimed to be unaware of significant political differences within the American Jewish community with regard to Israel, and he refused to speak out on behalf of Israeli soldiers being held captive in the Gaza Strip and Lebanon.

He also told the rabbis that his use of the incendiary term "apartheid" was meant to apply only to the West Bank and Gaza and not to Israel itself, which he described as a vibrant democracy.

The rabbis professed to be "shocked" by the revelation, noting that the book did not convey any sense of admiration for Israel. Carter promised he would be more explicit in drawing that distinction in subsequent media interviews.

Carter also expressed his willingness to condemn Palestinian terrorism more vociferously and to consider traveling to Israel with the rabbis, provided they also agreed to visit locations he deemed significant for his understanding of the conflict. The meeting concluded with participants joining hands in prayer.

In a subsequent phone call with Carter, Rabbi Straus asked the former president if he saw the Palestinians as bearing any measure of culpability for the breakdown in the peace process.

"He couldn't see any failures," Rabbi Straus said.

"Somehow or another, he has accepted the Palestinian vision and understanding of the Israeli-Arab dialogue, and is not able to be critical of the Palestinian community," said Rabbi Straus, of Temple Emanuel of Tempe, Ariz. "You read through the book and there's almost no criticism of Palestinians, almost no mention of terrorism."

Released last month, Carter's book has come under intense criticism from Jewish organizations who have criticized everything from its title – which evokes comparisons to apartheid South Africa – to its scholarship, which has been described as shoddy and riddled with errors.

The Anti-Defamation League, in particular, has taken Carter to task, sponsoring an ad campaign in major American publications and devoting a section of its website to criticizing the book.

Abraham Foxman, the ADL's national director, told JTA that Carter is "engaging in anti-Semitism" by suggesting that his book is a reaction to stifled debate on Israel.

Criticism of Carter has not been restricted to Jewish organizations.

Writing in the Washington Post, Michael Kinsley called the apartheid analogy "a foolish and unfair comparison, unworthy of the man who won – and deserved – the Nobel Peace Prize."

The chorus of outrage was heightened by the resignation this month of Kenneth Stein from his post as a fellow of the Carter Center, the former president's human rights foundation based at Emory University in Atlanta.

In his letter, which ended a 23-year association with the centre, Stein claims the book is "replete with factual errors, copied materials not cited, superficialities, glaring omissions and simply invented segments."

German forum decries Holocaust denial conference in Iran

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN – How many Iranians share their president's Holocaust denial?

Most would probably reject it, "but they're a silent majority," Israeli scholar David Menashri said, speaking Dec. 12 at a daylong conference in Berlin on "The Holocaust in Transnational Awareness."

Organized jointly by the Technical University of Berlin and the German Federal Department for Political Education, the event coincided with a meeting of Holocaust deniers and their sympathizers in Tehran on the invitation of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Participants in the Berlin event took the opportunity to condemn Ahmadinejad for his Holocaust denial, anti-Semitic statements and threats against Israel – which he repeated Tuesday to warm applause from delegates, who included a fringe group of haredi anti-Zionist Jews that often allies with Israel's enemies, and European and American writers who argue that the Holocaust was either fabricated or exaggerated.

"Thanks to people's wishes and God's will, the trend for the existence of the Zionist regime is downward, and this is what God has promised and what all nations want," Ahmadinejad said, according to news agencies. "Just as the Soviet Union was wiped out and today does not exist, so will the Zionist regime soon be wiped out."

Condemnations of the Tehran conference poured in from the West. The White House condemned the gathering as "an affront to the entire civilized world as well as to the traditional Iranian values of tolerance and respect." British Prime Minister Tony Blair called the meeting "shocking beyond belief" and said it proved beyond any doubt the Iranian regime's extremism.

In Berlin, speakers emphasized that Holocaust denial is a form of anti-Semitism and that Ahmadinejad is using the theme, together with his threats against Israel, to gain international standing among Arabs.

The average Iranian feels no solidarity with the Arabs, said Katajun Amirpur, a German journalist of Iranian background. For example, there is little support among Iranians for the Palestinians, she said.

"But Ahmadinejad is not addressing the Iranian masses," Amirpur said. "Rather, he is addressing much more the Arab masses when he says that 'if' there was a Holocaust, and 'if' the Germans caused it, then they should settle the problem. It is in line with what 95 per cent of Arabs think," she said.

German journalist Esther Shapira said it's a mistake to dismiss Ahmadinejad's remarks.

"If Ahmadinejad says Israel should be wiped off the map – and he is not planning to revive Nazi Germany's plan to move the Jews to Madagascar – we should take him seriously," Shapira said. "It is dangerous to say that this is not what he really means."

Holocaust denial came to Iran years ago, with the 1979 Islamic revolution. But Ahmadinejad, Menashri emphasized, "really believes in what he says."

"He has an apocalyptical approach, that he was sent to pave the way" for the coming of the Messiah, he said.

Menashri said Europe has a moral responsibility to raise its voice about the Holocaust.

"They should tell the Iranian leader to get off of the Holocaust, you are touching very sensitive nerves, and not just of Jews but of many peoples," he said. "That is the only request I have of Europe."

Leading Muslim clerics "should stand up and say, 'That's enough, let's take care of the real business in the Muslim world. And the real business is not denial of the Holocaust,'" Menashri added.

Among the speakers at the Berlin conference were Holocaust scholar Raul Hilberg; historian Wolfgang Benz, director of the Center for Research on Anti-Semitism in Berlin; Jean-Yves Camus of the Institute of International and Strategic Relations in Paris; historian Wolfgang Kraushaar of the Hamburg Institute for Social Research; historian Peter Longerich, director of the Research Center for the Holocaust and Twentieth Century History at the Royal Holloway College of the University of London; Israeli journalist and sociologist Natan Sznaider; and Gert Weisskirchen, a member of the German Parliament and representative on matters related to anti-Semitism to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

While participants agreed that the Iran conference attracted a handful of well-known Holocaust deniers and their supporters, they noted that active Holocaust deniers were few.

"Numerically, they're not many," Camus said. "But they do have a network that puts their propaganda onto the virtual level," on the Internet.

Benz spreading information about the Holocaust to a new generation is not easy.

"The best teaching can be undone," he said, "when a pupil goes home, reports on what he learned, and then hears from an older relative, 'Oh, you know what it's like with the Jews.'"

"It ruins the whole lesson," said Benz, adding that media such as television and film are "more important than any other means of education."

'A sick phenomenon'

In Quebec, the National Assembly passed an all-party motion slamming the conference.

"The National Assembly unequivocally denounces the convening of a reprehensible conference in Iran whose objective is to dispute the historical accuracy of the Holocaust, since it is inconceivable to put into doubt one of the greatest tragedies of humanity, which was the extermination and suffering of several million people."

The motion was tabled by National Revenue Minister Lawrence Bergman, Sylvain Simard of the Parti Québécois, and Marc Picard of the Action démocratique du Québec.

The Senate, meanwhile, adopted a resolution condemning "in the strongest terms the international Holocaust denial conference held in Iran… and any and all vile anti-Semitic statements made by Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and other Iranian leaders." It also called on the United Nations "to officially and publicly repudiate all of Iran's anti-Semitic statements made at such conference and hold accountable UN members states that encourage and echo such statements."

Jewish organizations, meanwhile, also condemned the Iranian government for hosting the conference and suggested it is part of a broader effort to attack the legitimacy of the State of Israel.

"This conference was nothing more than a vicious public attempt to whitewash the proven facts that the Nazis and their collaborators carried out mass murder against millions of Jewish men, women and children," said Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan.

"Iran is using the Holocaust as a weapon, but people of good conscience the world over see this for what it truly is – anti-Semitism, plain and simple," he said. "That includes students at Tehran University and many other Iranians who have protested against the conference, and we salute them for their courage and commitment to truth."

B'nai Brith Canada called on "the global community to recognize Iran's latest attempt at Holocaust denial for what it is – a blatant attempt to delegitimize the Jewish people.

"The purpose of the conference is clear," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of the group. "It is mere window dressing for advancing inherently anti-Semitic attitudes, whose echoes can be felt throughout the entire Middle East and elsewhere."

The Simon Wiesenthal Center, meanwhile, sponsored a three-way video conference that brought together 60 Holocaust survivors in Toronto, Los Angeles and New York to repudiate the Tehran conference.

"It wasn't enough that their loved ones were murdered in the death camps – now they have to prove to Ahmadinejad they are not liars," said Rabbi Marvin Hier, founder and dean of the Wiesenthal Center. "As one of today's survivors put it, 'If the Holocaust was a myth, where is my sister?'"

Iran's tiny Jewish community reacted with dismay to the controversial Holocaust conference.

Maurice Motamed, the only Jewish MP in the Iranian parliament, said, "This is indeed an insult, not only towards the Jews in Iran but also worldwide as it is widely known that we are quite sensitive as far as the Holocaust is concerned.

"To question this historically proven fact has indeed made us quite upset," Motamed said. A Jewish physician in Teheran – who spoke on condition of anonymity – called the conference "sad" and "indecent."

"Iran can criticize the Israeli government or even not acknowledge Israel as a sovereign state, but misusing the Holocaust for political causes is simply sad," the physician said.

Meanwhile in Israel, Yosef Lapid, chair of the Yad Vashem Council, called the conference of Holocaust-deniers an attempt by Ahmadinejad "to pave the way psychologically" for the western world to accept that another Holocaust is possible.

Lapid, a Holocaust survivor and former justice minister, said Ahmadinejad was following in the footsteps of Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels, who labelled Jews as parasites worthy of being murdered.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert denounced the conference before embarking on a two-day trip to Germany.

"This is a sick phenomenon that shows the depth of hatred of the fundamentalist Iranian regime," he said.

Neturei Karta condemned

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Orthodox Jews around the world reacted angrily to the participation of a half-dozen members of the Neturei Karta sect at a Holocaust-denial conference in Tehran.

Concerned that the Neturei Karta, who resemble other Torah-observant groups, would bring disrepute to their communities, Orthodox spokespeople distanced themselves from the what they termed a "fringe" group who had openly embraced the Iranian leader President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who is pledged to Israel's annihilation.

The Neturei Karta are giving Orthodoxy a bad name while strengthening the position of Jew haters and those who would destroy Israel, they say.

Rabbi Dovid Schochet, president of the Vaad Harabonim in Toronto (council of Orthodox rabbis), said the participation by the Neturei Karta in the Holocaust-denial conference "is horrible. It's like embracing Hitler after he killed the Jews and saying we're your friend."

Rabbi Moshe Lowy, who heads Agudath Israel in Toronto and who serves on the Vaad's rabbinical court, said "what they did was an act of chilul HaShem (desecrating God's name), disgusting, repulsive. To sit down with someone ready to murder Jews at a conference denying the Holocaust… I don't think they have any rabbis backing them."

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, senior rabbi of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, likewise called it a chilul HaShem, saying, "When a Jew goes and shows friendliness, acceptance of any outward enemies of the Jews, it is a disgrace of God's name, especially as they are dressed as Orthodox Jews.

"It's showing to the world that 'I'm friends with the man who wants to destroy five or six million Jews [in Israel],'" he added.

In Montreal, Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem congregation, stated in a written piece that "virtually all Jews are appalled by the support that the Neturei Karta gives to Israel's anti-Semitic enemies."

Rabbi Steinmetz noted that "Rabbi Moshe Hirsch, the group's elder statesman, has close ties to the Palestinian leadership and was on [former Palestinian president] Yasser Arafat's payroll.

"The Neturei Karta maintain close ties to Iran as well. In June 2000, Rabbi Yisroel David Weiss supported Iran's accusations that 13 Jews had spied for Israel – this, while governments around the world protested these false arrests."

Rabbi Steinmetz stated that "because of their bizarre behaviour, they have been condemned multiple times by haredim, and they are viewed by them as infuriating oddities. Simply put, the Neturei Karta are a fringe group, far less relevant than the Hare Krishna."

According to Wikipedia, the online encyclopedia, Neturei Karta, which translates from Aramaic as "Guardians of the City," number between 1,000 and 5,000 worldwide. They are concentrated mostly in Jerusalem, with others residing in Ramat Bet Shemesh, Safed, Bnei Brak, New York City, Vienna and Antwerp. There is a small community near Montreal.

The Neturei Karta's website describes the group as originating in Jerusalem. The group "refused and still refuse to recognize the existence or authority of the so-called 'State of Israel' and made [and still make] a point of publicly demonstrating their position, the position of the Torah and authentic unadulterated Judaism."

"The Neturei Karta refuse to recognize the right of anyone to establish a 'Jewish' state during the present period of exile."

That, the Neturei Karta believe, will only come about when "a universally accepted Moshiach" arrives.

Neturei Karta spokespeople at the conference in Tehran said Israel's existence posed a greater threat to the Jews than Holocaust deniers.

Rabbi Steinmetz suggests that as other Orthodox groups accepted Israel, the Neturei Karta became more isolated and "in turn, [their] theology grew even more radical and the behaviour of its leaders increasingly bizarre.

"For the Neturei Karta, anti-Zionism is the focus of their theology, and as a consequence, they demonize all Zionists as disciples of Satan."

Rabbi Schochet believes the Neturei Karta have gone beyond the pale by siding with those who wish to destroy Israel. "They embraced someone who is an enemy, who wants to destroy all the Jews."

What's more, the Neturei Karta's actions in Iran have tarred other Orthodox Jews with the same brush.

"It gives the unenlightened Jews the wrong impression of Orthodoxy. This is not Orthodox, this is a minority," he said.

Rabbi Zaltzman, who is affiliated with the Chabad Lubavitch movement, agreed that the sect's actions "give Orthodox Jews a bad name. But the bigger problem is disgracing God's name. Now Iran can say, 'I'm not so bad. Jews agree with me.'

"No matter if you're a Zionist or you disagree with the government [of Israel], what does that have to do with treason and going against six million Jews living in Israel?" he asked. "To align with the number 1 enemy in the world… there are no words."

In a news release, the Agudath Israel of America called the Neturei Karta "a disgrace to the Jewish people."

"Neither their professed determination to protect the interests of Jews nor their haredi garb can obscure the fact that all they accomplish is to offer succor and support to people who eagerly wish to do grave harm to Jews," the Agudah stated.

In New York, the Orthodox Union, representing mainstream Orthodox congregations, condemned the Neturei Karta as a disgrace to Judaism and unrepresentative of the Jewish people.

"We can only hope that the world is smart enough to recognize that the presence of these individuals is proof only that Ahmadinejad will stoop as low as necessary to demonstrate his hatred of the Jewish people and Israel and that no matter how low he stoops, there is always some enemy of Israel he will find – even if that enemy happens to be Jewish," the OU stated.

Satmar leaders of Congregation Yetev Lev in Brooklyn denounced the Neturei Karta as "reckless outcasts."

The Jews who went to Iran "trampled on the memory of their ancestors and people. They embraced the disciplines and followers of their murderers," they said in a statement.

The Neturei Karta are often confused with the Satmars, who also are anti-Zionist but acknowledge that six million Jews died in the Holocaust. The Satmars say there is no connection between them and Neturei Karta, which sent six delegates to the conference under the banner "Jews United Against Zionism."

Neturei Karta spokesperson Rabbi Weiss claimed the numbers of those killed in the Holocaust are exaggerated. He said, "Zionists are using the Holocaust to brazenly and offensively oppress a people."

The Satmars from Congregation Yetev Lev responded in their statement by saying that "the unavenged blood of the millions of Jewish victims cries out in pain and abhorrence to these reckless outcasts, 'How can you sink so low?'"

Israel stops Hamas money from entering

Israel prevented the Palestinian Authority prime minister from bringing millions of dollars into the Gaza Strip. Ismail Haniyeh entered Gaza from Egypt late Thursday night after Egyptian authorities delayed him for hours on Israel's request; Haniyeh was returning to Gaza with $35 million (US) in cash raised during a tour of Arab countries and Iran. Egypt let Haniyeh in once he agreed to leave the money with associates in Egypt. Israel opposes any funding for Haniyeh or his cabinet, controlled by Haniyeh's terrorist Hamas Party.

Rockets hit southern Israel

A Qassam rocket hit the southern Israeli town of Sderot. Ha'aretz reported that the rocket, fired last Thursday evening from northern Gaza, damaged buildings and vehicles; four people were treated for shock. It follows a similar attack earlier in the day, in which a rocket struck a kibbutz in the western Negev, damaging property but causing no injuries. Sderot and surrounding areas have continually come under fire from Palestinian rockets since Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip in the summer of 2005, despite a supposed ceasefire that Palestinian terrorist groups declared several weeks ago.

Aliyah spike predicted

More than 3,000 North Americans will immigrate to Israel by the end of 2006, the Jewish Agency for Israel predicted. JAFI said in a release this week that the number would be the highest since 1983. As of Nov. 30, 2,816 Americans and Canadians had become Israeli citizens in 2006. There has been an increase of 10 per cent a year since 2001, JAFI added. The year 2006 also will mark the largest number of olim from the United Kingdom since 1984, and the highest number from France since 1972.

Israel cracks Islamic Jihad ring

Israeli security forces have cracked a major West Bank terrorist ring. The Shin Bet security service announced Tuesday that it had arrested 50 suspected terrorists from the Hebron area in a swoop timed to prevent a major series of attacks. The detainees are said to belong to Islamic Jihad.

New UN chief blasts Iran's Holocaust denial

The incoming United Nations secretary general said it was unacceptable for Iran to deny the Holocaust and threaten Israel. "Denying historical facts, especially on such an important subject as the Holocaust, is just not acceptable," Ban Ki-moon said last Thursday, according to Reuters. "Nor is it acceptable to call for the elimination of states or people." Ban's comments came at a news conference following his swearing-in ceremony at UN headquarters in New York. Ban succeeds Kofi Annan as secretary general on Jan. 1.

Targeted killings ruled legal

In its long-awaited ruling on "targeted killings" of senior Palestinian terrorists, Israel's High Court of Justice rejected civil-rights groups' demands for a blanket ban, but urged security forces to be discriminating. "In its fight against international terrorism, Israel must act according to the rules of international law. These rules are based on balancing," wrote the three-justice panel headed by outgoing High Court President Aharon Barak. "Thus it is decided that it cannot be determined in advance that every targeted killing is prohibited according to customary international law, just as it cannot be determined in advance that every targeted killing is permissible according to customary international law."

Olmert visits Germany, Italy

Ehud Olmert visited Germany, Italy and the Vatican last week. The Israeli prime minister met with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi and Pope Benedict XVI. He pressed Europe to continue its hard line against the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority and Iran's nuclear program. –JTA

Eating together as a family

Have we lost the art of eating together as a family? If so, what's at stake?

We all live increasingly busy lives in a fast-paced world where both parents work; kids have lessons, programs and practices galore; phones ring and e-mails are forever arriving. In all the hustle and bustle, I think that a great tradition is dying.

In my work, I talk to people of all ages at different stages of their lives. I myself have a busy household with children ages six and eight, and know how easy it is – and often more convenient – to eat separately. This allows everyone to eat what they like, with different meals for each person. It may also allow parents to have a quiet meal after the kids have gone to bed, and it cuts down on preparation time and cleanup.

On the flip side, I see in my practice a lot of very negative things emerging from this routine.

First, if we don't eat together as a family, at least some of the time, when do we come together to discuss our day, establish a sense of family for our children and instil in them the importance of getting together around a table to reconnect?

In addition, from a nutritional standpoint, much more than an honourable social tradition is being lost. Children learn to eat and develop good eating habits by modelling. They need to watch how you eat, physically, as well as what you eat. If salad or veggies are included at each meal, even if the kids don't eat them – although hopefully they do – then they are learning that this is what a balanced dinner looks like.

Most people I speak to admit that it is easier to make separate meals for the kids, feed them earlier and give them what they want. Then the adults eat more quietly, more healthfully later.

This usually means that kids are served "kiddy food" for most meals – usually chicken fingers, hot dogs or burgers, pizza, pasta, etc. Then the parents complain that their child eats only kiddy food. However, if that's all they have been exposed to, then the occasional meal of fish, broccoli and rice will seem less interesting and appetizing.

Parents also often report that kids eat alone or in front of the TV. You need to remember that the routines you introduce kids to in their younger years are the ones that they will copy later. I am sure you have fond memories of eating together as a family when you were growing up.

Now, let's be practical. This is a different time. I also have a TV in my kitchen, and my kids are allowed to watch it while eating breakfast or having a snack, but at dinner time, it's not an option. That's our conversation time.

My goal is for us to eat together as often as we can. I realize this is not possible for multiple meals in a day, or even in a week, but there have to be a few meals where this can work, and trust me, your kids will look forward to them. You don't all have to be there either for this to work. Some members of the family eating together is better than everyone fending for themselves.

Now, the issue that I am usually faced with when I suggest that families should eat together more often – what to make? Coming together is the first step. So, if you've picked up a roasted chicken and opened a bag of pre-washed lettuce, you have a quick, affordable, crowd-pleasing meal. Or you can order a pizza with whole wheat crust and make a salad.

But if you are going to cook, try to make at least one thing everyone will like.

The healing power of walking

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — People who lose someone close to them often retreat into themselves and neglect their own basic needs.

"Many people, when grieving, aren't sleeping, exercising or using their lines of support, and sometimes depression takes over," says Shelley Levit, head of the Walking Bereavement Group of Winnipeg's Jewish Child and Family Services (JCFS). "One of the most important concepts we try to get across to participants is that silence is a prison, and sharing is the key."

She says the goal of the group, which was initiated by Hospice and Palliative Care Manitoba in conjunction with JCFS at the end of 1998, is to "promote self-care of the whole person.

"A walking group helps people who might otherwise hesitate [about] joining a straight support group to address their grieving. It takes away some of the hesitation and intimidation. Even though this is, in a sense, a support group, people are more likely not to be scared off by it, as it is not called 'therapy,' or 'counselling.'"

The walking group accepts anyone who has lost an adult loved one, but not those who have lost young children. The reason for this, Levit says, is that "people who have lost young children need very specific, unique attention, which a group atmosphere does not allow for."

Levit works with volunteers who become group leaders after they have attended a training session to learn about the needs of people who are going through the grieving process.

On average, there are six to 14 participants in each eight-week walking session, two hours per week, Levit says. And ages of participants range from people in their 20s to those in their 70s.

"Generally, smaller groups are more conducive to having group members feeling comfortable opening up and being able to get enough individual attention from group leaders," says Levit. "Sometimes group members have just lost a loved one, but others come at a point of delayed grieving, sometime five, 10, or more years after having lost someone dear to them.

"A couple of the big issues people have to address," she says, "are suppressed feelings of anger and guilt, as well as having to deal with a huge change or loss in lifestyle and finances, or a best friend and appreciation."

The group guidelines include confidentiality and giving everyone a chance to speak and cry.

"During the first session," Levit says, "most people are nervous, not knowing what to expect. You could cut the atmosphere with a knife because of the tension and anxiety. A few people drop out early on, but things improve after a couple of sessions, and the people who have remained, begin to get comfortable and open up.

"Often," she adds, "the agency [JCFS] gets about 50 per cent non-Jewish participants who join the walking group. We sometimes get referrals come to us from the hospice, as well as through the information we send out to the public."

Walking locations vary according to the weather and time of year. Participants walk at the Rady Centre indoor track, Assiniboine Park and the Wellness Centre indoor track. Stretching with musical accompaniment is incorporated into the experience, led by fitness centre staff. The group also does "centring exercises," where they meditate in a JCFS boardroom, with low lighting, candles and music.

New bereavement walking groups are started three times a year, in the winter, spring and fall.

Singer lends her voice to the visually impaired

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

What if you couldn't read the article you're now holding in your hands?

Imagine trying to sit down with your favourite magazine or newspaper after eye-surgery or if you lost your sight.

For many Canadians, this is a daily reality.

Fortunately, there are people like Melissa Ungar who offer their services to read for those who can't.

For the past four years, Ungar has read articles as a volunteer for the non-profit Voiceprint Canada, the country's only 24-hour reading service.

The organization reaches nearly 3.2 million print-restricted Canadians.

Every Thursday, Ungar goes to Voiceprint to recite the political, entertainment, business and sports news they would otherwise miss because of visual restrictions or learning disabilities.

Voiceprint creates digital audio files of the readings, which clients then download from the service's website to listen to as they see fit.

A professionally trained voice-over artist, Ungar is proud of her work with the charity.

"It's pretty amazing," she said. "It hits you right away when you're working there. I thought, 'Wow! I'm reading for visually impaired people who can't pick up a newspaper.' I love Voiceprint."

And hers is a reliable voice.

She attended Ryerson University for vocal training and is currently represented by Voxtalent Canada.

The 36-year-old Torontonian freelancer makes her living recording for the Internet, radio, TV and film.

But before she could talk – professionally that is – she could sing.

Ungar studied at the Royal Conservatory of Music and in York University's music program.

It has always been her dream to sing professionally, and this year, she decided to make it happen.

Ungar released her first CD, Checkered Past, in September.

Dedicated to her late father, Paul Ungar, who died when she was eight years old, it is her 10-song, self-produced introduction to the public.

The album is replete with cover versions of her favourite pop tunes, many of which are Elton John hits.

She intended to make an original album, but it wasn't in the cards this time around.

"I have been looking for original songs for years, being a singer and not a writer," she said. "I can't write my way out of a paper bag."

Being unable to find the right songwriting partner, Ungar decided to go ahead and record popular tunes.

"Everyone likes Elton John songs… and I picked ones that people know and like," Ungar said.

She also picked one that she feels links her to her Jewish heritage, Border Song.

"If you listen to the words, it's all about fighting racism," she said. "Elton even sings about Moses in it."

Though she realized it was a somewhat backward way to go about releasing a first album, Ungar felt compelled to so nonetheless.

"I'm glad I finally have [an album] done that I could put out there for people to hear," she said.

Aside from fulfilling her dream to create music, Ungar also donated $1 to Voiceprint Canada from every CD sold.

One thousand copies were printed in 2006, most of which have been sold with the help of Voiceprint.

"They heard about my plan for an album and were very encouraging," Ungar said. "They sent out the album to all their offices across Canada, and we'll be recording a promo for it on their station in 2007."

Ungar has also started planning a follow-up CD, to be launched sometime in 2007.

She hopes to find a songwriter to collaborate with on the new project, but if not, she'll record another set of covers to please both her listeners and herself.

New Dr. Rebecca Temple mystery published

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In her recently published mystery novel, Season of Iron, Sylvia Maultash Warsh includes two stories in alternating chapters. She brings together a murder in Toronto in 1979 and the events that link it to Berlin in the 1930s, before and during the rise of the Nazis to power.

As in her first two novels in the series, To Die in Spring and Find Me Again, the main character of Season of Iron (Dundurn Press) is Dr. Rebecca Temple, a Toronto family physician who practises psychotherapy.

Rebecca has befriended a homeless woman, Birdie, who is killed in the backyard of a German fencing instructor. An Egyptian physician who is in Toronto to talk about a new drug he is developing from snake venom has some mysterious connection to the fencing instructor.

The other story in the book is about a Jewish family, the Eisenbaums, during the Nazi rise to power. It documents the loss of the rights of Germany's Jews. Frederika, the youngest child of the Eisenbaums, becomes a doctor against all odds. After she loses her right to practise, she is sent to a concentration camp.

The two stories, Rebecca and Frederika's, intersect with a startling conclusion.

We, the Orthodox Rabbis of Toronto, express our outrage at the behavior of members of Neturei Karta at the recent conference in Teheran of holocaust denial.
They do not represent us. They are a disgrace to the Jewish people. To greet the Iranian President, who has expressed his evil intent publicly on many occasions is despicable. And to participate in a conference of holocaust denial pains us to the core. This irreverent insult to the victims of the Shoah is shameful and profanes their holy memory.
Though these men appear to be orthodox, they represent no one but themselves. Their actions have been condemned by all Orthodox groups. We, the united voice of the Orthodox Rabbis of Toronto, condemn their behavior in no uncertain terms.

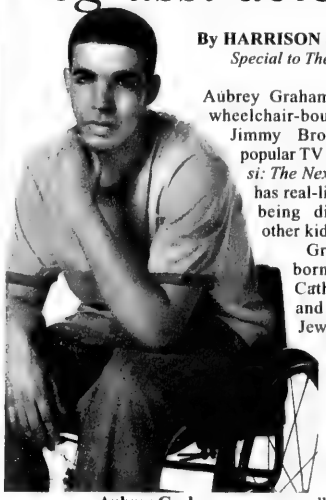
Degrassi actor says being different made him stronger



Aubrey Graham

By HARRISON JORDAN
Special to The CJN

Aubrey Graham, who plays wheelchair-bound student Jimmy Brooks on the popular TV show Degrassi: The Next Generation, has real-life experience being different than other kids.

Graham was born to a black Catholic father and a white Jewish mother, and went to school at Toronto's Forest Hill Collegiate. Growing up with mostly white peers was tough for him.

"Going to Forest Hill was definitely an interesting way of growing up," he says. "When you're young and unaware that the world is made up of different people, it is tough growing up. But me being different from everyone else just made me a lot stronger."

Graham has played Jimmy on Degrassi since the start of the first season in 2001. Alienation aside, he says he is very different from his TV character.

"People have to realize that every character on every television show is just that," he says. "Obviously in five years I've become extremely connected.

"It's sort of second nature to switch into Jimmy on set, but there are very little similarities between a character and a person, unless you get so immersed into the role, that you become your character."

Graham's acting career started in high school. "There was a kid in my class whose father was an agent. His dad would say, 'If there's anyone in the class that makes you laugh, have them audition for me.' After the audition he became my agent," he says.

His decision to become an actor was supported by his family. "My father and my mother are both people who definitely support anything in the arts. My father is a musician and my mother's side is immersed in music and acting."

Before Graham shot to stardom as Jimmy on Degrassi: The Next Generation, he appeared in Convicted with Omar Epps (now Dr. Formean on House M.D.) "To work with him was amazing, because as a young black man, [I realized] we have many talented people, and Omar Epps is definitely one of them," he says.

Graham was nominated for a Young Artist Award for best supporting actor in a TV series for Degrassi in 2004 and was the 2002 winner of a Young Artist Award for best ensemble actor in a TV series for Degrassi.

He has a role in the upcoming movie Charlie Bartlett with Robert Downey Jr.

Graham has entered into the music scene and will release a rap mix-tape in February under the pseudomym of "Drake." He plans to release a CD soon as well.

Debut novel nominated for Arthur Ellis Award

In Season of Iron, Warsh connects the Holocaust to the Middle East.

"I have had an interest in Islam and Arabic culture since 9/11," she says. "I was disheartened to find a direct historical link between the Nazis and Islamist extremism. I was so intrigued with the historical connections that I've worked some of them into the plot."

Warsh was born in Stuttgart, Germany, to parents who survived the Holocaust. The family immigrated to Canada when she was four years old.

She grew up in Toronto and attended Downsview Collegiate and received a master's degree in linguistics at the University of Toronto.

"I grew up listening to my mother's stories about how she fled from the Nazis in Poland, then survived the brutality of the labour camps. My mother's stories sparked an interest in history, especially the war, and this has had a great influence on my writings," she says.

Her first novel, To Die in Spring, was nominated for an Arthur Ellis Award for best first novel. Her second novel, Find Me Again, won an Edgar Allan Poe Award.

The third Rebecca Temple mystery is filled with surprises as Warsh peels off the façades of her characters to reveal their true identities and motives.

Warsh is currently working on her fourth book, which departs from the Dr. Rebecca Temple series. She also teaches creative writing to seniors, gives literary lectures and writes magazine articles and poetry.

'Near-death experience' changes artist's outlook

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

A few years after her promising debut CD, The Great Disappearing Act, Toronto singer-songwriter Kat Goldman literally disappeared from the music scene.

It wasn't by choice.

While she was ordering a bagel from a shop at Bathurst and Wilson in north Toronto, a car drove through the window and pinned her and a plethora of tables and chairs against a wall.

Her immediate thought, being in a predominately Jewish neighbourhood, was that she was caught in a terrorist act.

"It felt like a bomb explosion, not a car crash," Goldman, 36, recalls.

Her next thought was that she should get some food. "I wanted someone to buy me a cream-cheese bagel. I thought I should eat something before they rushed me to hospital."

Goldman suffered a crushed tibial plateau (a broken right knee, which required a graft from her pelvic bone), and a soft tissue injury to her left arm.

Now, after a period of recovery and therapy, Goldman has resurfaced with her second independent CD, Sing Your Song.

Kat Goldman

"Maybe I died/ And came back to life/ All I know for sure/ Is that I want to survive," she sings in her Sarah McLaughlin/Jane Siberry-like voice on the title track.

Goldman has emerged from the tragedy happy to be alive and full of hope. "This is a new chapter – a new beginning. The future is unknown and I really look forward to it." After all, she says, "I'm alive, and still have two legs to walk on."

After what she refers to as her "near-death experience," Goldman developed a more positive outlook, which shows on her new songs.

"My first album was about losing oneself in relationships and about suffering from depression – which in itself is a great disappearing act."

But she admits her new songs are more positive. "I'm much more grounded now," she says. "I've become very optimistic. The accident made me a much more positive person. I started to understand what really matters."

One major drawback though is that she can no longer dance.

"I used to be a pretty good dancer. Now I look pretty stupid dancing," she says, laughing.

By her own admission, her career has had many ups and downs.

After finishing high school (she attended Forest Hill Collegiate and Earl Haig Secondary School) and studying music and dance at York University, she spent five years in Boston and then moved to New York.

After recording and releasing her debut CD, she was spotted by big-time manager Ron Fierstein, who has managed Suzanne Vega and Grammy winner Shawn Colvin.

"It was a very exciting time for me as a Toronto girl. I got to play at the Bottom Line [a prestigious New York City club] where Tony Bennett was once in the audience. There's something exciting about being in New York City – this feeling that you could be discovered anytime."

Her music was showcased to major labels, and though there was interest, it just never worked out.

"I worked hard to promote the record for three years and had various people coming out to see me. A lot of carrots were dangled before me, but unfortunately I couldn't get a record deal. It just didn't happen."

Now Goldman is back at it again, performing and promoting her new work. Sing Your Song has been creating a buzz and receiving airplay on CBC Radio.

"This is a very hard business to be in, especially for a woman," she says. "You have to be tough and persistent. As an artist you have to be sensitive, but as a business person you have to be tough. It's a bit of a manic ride."

Her persistence shows signs of paying off. Annabel, a song from her first album was recorded by Grammy nominees The Duhks and also played on a Christian television show in the states. "I suddenly started getting royalty cheques," Goldman says.

Just last week she was offered the opportunity to open for former Men At Work singer Colin Hay in New York next March.

Sing Your Song was produced by Maury La Foy, a popular producer-session bass player in the Toronto indie scene. It has 11 original songs of hers, most of which are backed with a full band and run the gamut from melodic folk to piano melodies, pop and the rocky Stay the Course.

"Writing melodies is a mysterious process," she says. "I wake up at night with a melody in my head and sing it into the answering machine by the bed."

Golman listens to a lot of the great singer-songwriters such as Shawn Colvin, Paul McCartney, John Lennon and Joni Mitchell.

She is in the process of lining up some dates for the new year and continues to experiment musically. Recently, she showcased her new CD live with a string quartet.

"I have to keep up this positive outlook that something good can and will happen to me," she says. "And who knows? It only takes one song."

To hear samples of her songs and find out about live gigs, visit her website www.katgoldman.com. Her cds can be bought from www.maplemusic.com.

Children's book about the Holocaust optioned as a movie

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Once upon a time, Kathy Kacer's mother, Gabi, hid from the Nazis in a wooden dresser in her family home. Gabi was then a girl whose survival depended on successfully eluding the German soldiers who were rounding up the Jews in her Czechoslovakian town.

Kathy Kacer

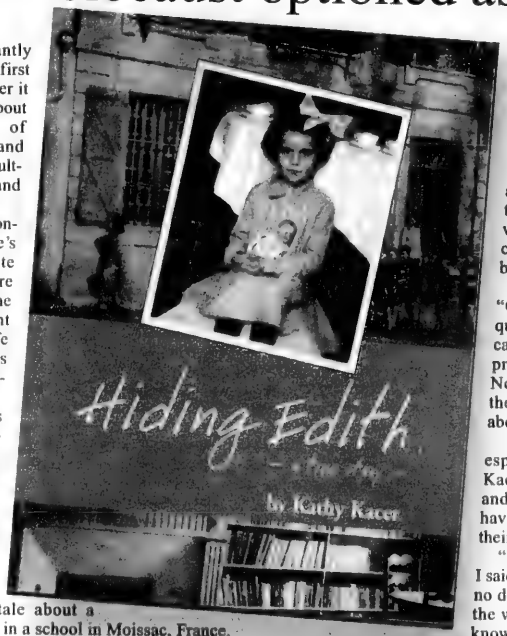
Little could she have known that seven decades later, her daughter would write a book about her wartime ordeal – The Secret of Gabi's Dresser – that would win a bouquet of awards, sell more than 50,000 copies in multiple translations worldwide, and be made into a play and optioned as a movie.

"To me it's so awe inspiring," said Kacer, the Toronto psychologist-turned-children's-author who has written four more Holocaust-related books since The Secret of Gabi's Dresser appeared in 1999. All have been published as part of the acclaimed series of Holocaust remembrance books for young readers published by Toronto-based Second Story Press. Kacer's latest, Hiding Edith, appeared earlier this year.

While three of these books may be classified as historical fiction and the other two as non-fiction, all make for highly compelling reading for young readers and even adults, according to publisher Margie Wolfe. It was Wolfe who exuberantly pounced on Kacer's first manuscript soon after it was offered to her about 1997. Two years of tough revisions and editing followed, resulting in commercial and critical success.

"Even with the non-fiction books, she's been able to write them as if they were novels, with the same kind of excitement and drama," Wolfe said. "She makes them read like adventure books."

That Kacer's books also appeal to grown-ups was demonstrated in November at the Jewish Book Fair, where a full house came to the Leah Posluns Theatre to hear her talk about Hiding Edith, a gripping tale about a Jewish girl in hiding in a school in Moissac, France.



As with other titles in the popular series, Kacer's books reach well beyond the Jewish world. She speaks frequently to Jewish classrooms but far more often to groups of children in the public and Catholic school systems.

Her speaking engagements have taken her all across the Greater Toronto Area and southern Ontario, to diverse points in Canada and the United States, even to Europe: England and Slovenia are among her upcoming destinations. Two years ago, she went to Germany to speak to children who had read her book Clara's War in translation.

"It was fantastic," she said. "German children are really quite educated about the Holocaust. They know their history, probably more so than most North American children, and they ask wonderful questions about that history."

The German youngsters were especially curious about what Kacer's parents, both survivors and now both deceased, might have thought about her visit to their country.

"I was quite honest with them. I said to them that my parents had no desire to go to Germany after the war and that I had grown up knowing that my parents had no desire to go to Germany. And it was very emotional for me to be there, talking about my parents' history to young children at this time in history.

"I also said I was thrilled to have come, because it opened my eyes to culture and history in a way I couldn't have imagined."

Kacer's other books for Second Story are The Night Spies and The Underground Reporters; she has also written four titles for Penguin's Our Canadian Girls series. "I'm not a historian, I'm a storyteller. My goal is to tell meaningful stories that children can connect with, so they'll be passed on."

Despite the nightmarish aspects of her subject matter, she maintains a gentle, trusting approach with her readers, never subjecting them to more than what she thinks they can handle. While she values veracity, she's not above changing the details of a real-life story to tighten a dramatic structure or improve a story line. That's why the genre is sometimes called "creative non-fiction."

Even when she's in the midst of writing one story, she's constantly on the lookout for more fresh and original Holocaust-survival tales to tell. "The truth is that every survivor story is a remarkable story, but not every survivor story is appropriate for the kind of book that I want to write," she said. "I look for something in the story, something I can't define, some element that makes me sit up and take notice."

Having worked for years with troubled teens as a psychologist, Kacer seems highly satisfied with her new ability to spread understanding and tolerance among more young people around the world than she could have ever reached before.

Her husband Ian Epstein, 21-year-old daughter Gabi and 20-year-old son Jake are the first to read her manuscripts. Someday, she said, one of her children will likely inherit her family's most prized heirloom – the dresser that protected her mother in 1942, which presently sits in the family dining room.

"The dresser has survived beyond the people that it helped protect," she said. "It's one of those pieces of furniture that will be passed on to my children, and they'll be passing on the story to the future. That's how history survives, from stories passed down from generation to generation."

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Laskin called Canada's first 'judicial celebrity'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The nation's first Jewish Supreme Court justice, Bora Laskin, was lauded last week as Canada's first "judicial celebrity."

The assessment was made by Philip Girard, a Dalhousie University law professor and the author of Bora Laskin: Bringing Law to Life, published by the University of Toronto Press.

Girard's cradle-to-grave biography, the first of its kind, starts with his birth in Fort William, Ont., (now part of Thunder Bay) in 1912 and ends with his death in Ottawa in 1984.

A graduate of Osgoode Hall Law School and Harvard University, Laskin was appointed to the Ontario Court of Appeal in 1965 after a long, distinguished career as a professor and scholar at the University of Toronto.

Then-prime minister Pierre Trudeau appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1970 and as chief justice some three years later.

Girard, who clerked at the Supreme Court when Laskin was chief justice, officially launched his 646-page book at a lecture and slide show at Holy Blossom Temple, where Laskin and his wife, Peggy, were members.

Describing Laskin as one of only two Canadian judges who left a mark on Canadian jurisprudence and brought it into the modern age, Girard said he made a "profound contribution" to constitutional and labour law, legal theory and "the development of human rights protection."

Explaining that Laskin was influenced by a "Jewish sense of justice," Girard said that he helped reinvigorate the Canadian notion of justice.

"He always thought that things could be better."

Laskin gave the Supreme Court unprecedented visibility, being the first of its judges to cultivate the media. "He was saying, 'The work of the court affects you, and you should know about it.'"

Supreme Court justices were "virtually unknown" to the Canadian public before the Laskin era, Girard commented.

A liberal who often found himself on the dissenting side of verdicts, Laskin was possessed by a strong sense of social justice, honed by his experiences as a young man, Girard noted.

The son of Russian Jewish immigrants, he was both an intellectual and an athlete in his youth, as well as valedictorian of his high school.

As a student in the United States during the depths of the Depression, he lived spartanly, sometimes on only one meal a day, and witnessed a parade of human suffering.

At Harvard, he studied under U.S. Supreme Court justice-to-be Felix Frankfurter. But in Toronto, after returning from Boston, he felt the sting of anti-Semitism.

Girard said that these brushes with poverty and racism stirred Laskin, a specialist in labour law, out of any "nascent complacency" and drew him to trade unionism, which at that time was the "kiss of death" for an up-and-coming lawyer.

For much of his life, Laskin, a civil libertarian, leaned to the left of centre. He was also always feisty and combative and loved a good fight, Girard added.

Citing two cases, including Murdoch v. Murdoch, Girard said Laskin tried to make the law more responsive to human needs.

"He gave justice a human face. This has become the standard approach."

Girard said that, until Laskin reached the Supreme Court, Canadian judges were "too complacent" and supported the status quo.

Laskin, however, was a "constructive subversive" and an "iconoclast" who felt that the Supreme Court in particular and the justice system in general were in dire need of change.

Throughout his years on the Supreme Court, Laskin ignored the hoary convention that justices should be heard but not seen.

He wanted the Supreme Court to be a more open institution, and judging by his contributions, he succeeded admirably.

When Trudeau announced his death, Girard writes in Bora Laskin, he said that Canadians had lost "one of their greatest champions of equity and fairness."

Golfer's rookie season points to long career

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — Morgan Pressel of Boca Raton has shown that she has the savvy and confidence at age 18 to be among the top players on the the Ladies Professional Golf Association (LPGA) tour.

At last month's $1-million (US) ADT Championships, Pressel showed her ability to play well under pressure in the 32-player field. She endured a playoff involving six golfers vying for three spots and became the first to advance to the third round by sinking a 25-foot birdie putt on the second-round playoff hole, receiving a loud cheer from fans and family.

Although Pressel didn't survive the second cut, she fared better than most LPGA stars, including top money-winner Annika Sorenstam. Pressel finished her rookie pro season 23rd on the money list with $465,685 (US) and placed among the top 10 in four of the last six tournaments she entered. Her best finish was third at the Long Drugs tournament.

"It has been a great experience thus far and I think I played fairly well all year," said Pressel.

"Morgan has had a steady year, even if it was not spectacular. Her ability to be consistent will get better with more experience," said her grandfather, Herb Krickstein, who has been accompanying Morgan on the pro circuit, along with Morgan's grandmother, Esther.

Some, such as former LPGA great Amy Alcott – the only golfer to be inducted in both the LPGA Tour Hall of Fame and the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame – think Pressel is destined to be a great star of the game for the next 20 years.

"The sky is the limit for Morgan. She has a lot of moxie by winning some amateur events. With some seasoning and a belief in herself, she may achieve all that I accomplished," said Alcott, now retired at 50.

Last year, as a 17-year-old amateur, Pressel made headlines by falling one shot short of becoming the youngest player to win the U.S. Open.

For Krickstein, it was a case of deja vu. More than 20 years ago, his son Aaron at age 16 made history by becoming the youngest champion to win a pro tennis title – in Tel Aviv – in 1983.

Aaron Krickstein was a top 10 tennis player from 1983 to 1994, ranking as high as sixth in the world in 1990.

"This is an incredible feeling – to have two superstar athletes in two sports in one family at a young age – that has to be a first. I don't think it is possible that this has been done in sports before," beamed Krickstein.

Pressel is so adept at golf that she turned down a scholarship at Duke university, instead choosing to turn pro this year.

Instant fame could make an 18-year-old who is halfway to being a millionaire forget about other things in her life, such as her education, family and being Jewish.

But that's not the case.

After her performance at the ADT Championships, Pressel took a break from the golf circuit to celebrate brother Mitchell's bar mitzvah at Congregation B'nai Torah in Boca Raton.

"I was lucky not to have to choose between playing a tournament over my brother's bar mitzvah, because of the Thanksgiving Day break, but I wanted to celebrate with Mitchell and my family," said Pressel.

Morgan had not been home for 107 consecutive days following high school graduation before returning for the bar mitzvah.

"I love playing golf, but it's not the only thing in my life. When I was 13, I was studying hard for my bat mitzvah and was so proud to have read the prayers in front of my family and friends," said Pressel.

Pressel has an impressive family legacy in both sports and Judaism. Pressel's great-grandfather was Joseph Krickstein, a Conservative rabbi who had a pulpit in Ann Arbor, Mich. Herb Krickstein excelled in baseball and was given a tryout by the Detroit Tigers, but he turned down the offer of a major league baseball contract to become a pre-medicine student.

Pressel's father Mike was a hockey player and younger sister Madison is becoming an excellent golfer herself. When Pressel's late mother Kathy, a former Big Ten tennis champion at University of Michigan, underwent chemotherapy for breast cancer in 1994, she sent Morgan to her father's summer home in Grosse Pointe, Mich.

Thus, Krickstein has been more than a regular grandfather to young Pressel, but a zaidie who has been both a loving grandparent and an instructor in golf.

Sadly, Kathy Pressel died in 2003 at age 43. Her love guides Morgan and her family.

"My mother always wanted the best from me. If I missed a shot, she would say 'Go hit the next one.' She was competitive and she set a good example for me," Pressel said.

Pressel is scheduled to play at the 2007 CN Canadian Open, to be held Aug. 13 to 19 in Edmonton.

Advice for the 21st-century rabbi

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

The rabbis of the Pirkei Avot are famous for recommending to each Jew "Asei lecha rav" – which loosely translates as "Make for yourself a rabbi." Historically, the rabbis we've chosen have dictated our every move, advising us on how to live, where to work, what to eat and what we should never, ever do. For the longest time, the rabbi was the man (more on gender later) we turned to for guidance and advice.

But times are changing – more quickly and radically now than ever before – and many are wondering exactly what place the rabbi holds in the 21st century.

Our lives are highly specified and personalized – we demand products, jobs and lifestyles designed to fit our personalities and opinions – so it's no surprise that we demand that our religion conform to individual tastes. The worlds of politics and business have tuned in to this "consumer is king" culture, but rabbis have been slow, and seemingly unwilling, to change.

To be sure, there are still groups of Jews out there – almost exclusively now in the Orthodox community – who seek advice from their rabbis before making any important decision. A large number of Jews, though, are increasingly more comfortable making their own choices, based on experience, education and individualized ideas of right and wrong. The growth of this demographic means that rabbis should be asking themselves, "What can we do to revitalize the roles we play in our communities?"

It's not just the 21st-century person who is making this question a tough one to answer. Rabbis haven't helped their own case. During the past year, rabbis have not make a particularly good impression on the public. Some examples:

• This past summer, Orthodox and Conservative rabbis in Toronto clashed. They were unwilling to compromise on what should have been a non-issue – whether to allow a youth choir with female participants to sing at a community event – causing one group to revoke their endorsement for a planned community-wide Holocaust memorial ceremony.

• Within Toronto's Orthodox community, a major rabbinic authority excommunicated a fellow haredi rabbi because of the latter's views on evolution and creation.

Of course, part of the problem is that rabbis still retain full management of who receives the title "rabbi," and, for the most part, they tend to ordain cookie-cutter versions of what has worked for the last few hundred years. It means, for example, that a knowledgeable, understanding, confident woman can never be ordained as an Orthodox rabbi. (Oddly, that same women might be allowed to teach Halachah and publish her interpretations of the Torah, as long as she does not retain the rabbinic title — the title, it seems, de-legitimizes her knowledge.)

If the rabbis were smart, they'd start asking the average Jew what he or she wants in a rabbi.

There is hope that rabbis will adapt to the changing attitudes of their communities: Earlier this month, Conservative Judaism's highest legal authorities convened in New York to decide on the future of homosexuality in their branch of Judaism (interestingly, at the same time, the Canadian government solidified the future of same-sex marriage in this country). Ultimately, the rabbis issued two distinct rulings, one allowing and one prohibiting the ordination of gay rabbis and same-sex commitment ceremonies.

This groundbreaking decision essentially leaves it up to each Jew to interpret religion. The Conservative governors have put the power of the rabbi in the hands of each Jew, trusting that each person will make a decision that is equal parts informed and personal.

That reading should become the standard for future rabbinic decisions on all issues. It's the path that Jews will be demanding more and more – the evolution from "Make for yourself a rabbi" to "Make yourself a rabbi."

Patty's Fruit/Berry Crisp In Filo Dough

A great recipe for New Year's Brunch

6-8 c berries/fruit
2 tbsp. corn starch
1/4 c orange juice
1/2 c sugar
1/4 pkg. frozen filo dough
3 tbsp. butter or margarine

Place fruit/berries (sliced or whole) into a slightly greased 9"x11" pyrex or baking pan. In a bowl, mix together cornstarch, orange juice and sugar. Pour over fruit/berries and let sit for 10 minutes. Shred (by knife or coarse grater) frozen filo dough and sprinkle over fruit. Melt butter/margarine and pour over dough.

Bake at 350° for 45 minutes. If not browned enough on top, broil until filo starts to brown, but watch carefully!

Paul, the carpenter

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Paul is a carpenter. He is my friend.

Once he was at a party and met a supremely attractive woman. Paul himself is a very attractive man, with a toned body shaped through long-distance bicycle riding. The woman asked Paul what he does for a living and he replied he was a carpenter.

For the next few hours, the debutante avoided Paul, likely looking down on him for being a "worker," someone who wore knee pads throughout his working day, hammering baseboards and knocking together wooden structures for new houses.

The host invited all the guests to sit down at his new seven-foot-long solid walnut, finely crafted dining-room table with sat-wood streaks and chocolate-coloured granite running down the middle. Astonished by the inspired workmanship, the woman ebulliently blurted out, "My, what an exquisite table! Who built this?"

The proud host turned to Paul, extending his hand in Paul's direction, and announced to his visitors, "Well, my friends, we are honoured to be joined by the designer and creator of this matchless table. Indeed, it is my good friend, Paul, who has built it."

The woman seemed aghast and embarrassed at how she had treated the carpenter. Paul smiled, his sky blue eyes shining, and he took in the victorious moment – one we are rarely treated to. He never saw the woman again.

This year, Paul's older brother died of Lou Gehrig's disease. His father died shortly afterward, falling to the ground on a sunny day, experiencing a fatal heart attack. A little while later, Paul's 12-year-old German shepherd, Hawkeye, departed this world. In a 12-month period, the carpenter incurred a loss in threes – as so frequently occurs.

When I saw Paul at a local confectionery store last week, he looked different. His hair was longer, dishevelled, and his way seemed to be freer, more relaxed than usual. He was present in the moment.

We hung out for the evening. His apartment was a sight to behold. Over the years, he has lived in an old brownstone, and has refurbished the interior by building superb cabinets and door frames, including what he calls his "Empire State Building doorway," and trim around the entire apartment.

After giving me the grand tour, Paul shared with me his pièce de résistance – a cabinet made of solid curly cherry and maple and walnut. The veneer is also cherry. It took six months to build, and he says that it's art more than anything else.

Paul told me he worked on the cabinet day and night. The way in which he described his commitment to this pure workmanship sounded like the great Rabbi Akiva's commitment to learning Torah – one in which he sacrificed all of his worldly goods to do so.

The carpenter told me that he would like to donate the cabinet to an institute or museum so as to ensure his legacy. When one is faced with so much death, it seems reasonable to desire a legacy of sorts. If you know of an organization that would be interested in displaying the cabinet, let me know.

Paul has developed an inner voice. He now speaks about his feelings – "I feel angry so often" – and the boredom he experiences with women who feel entitled – "I like very smart women."

My friend told me he's worried that he is unhealthy because he feels these things. I told him most people crave to be where he is at: pursuing inner peace; having the ability to follow one's passion; and having a mentor in his life and a protégé who "looks up to me. (I have never had that before)."

He speaks wisely and is in awe of the moment. "When I feel happy nowadays, I really know it," he said. We watched Japanese cartoons and talked about life.

Paul is a carpenter, and a most venerable one at that.

* All applicants are subject to credit approval through CITIFINANCIAL. All prices and payments are subject to applicable taxes. Equal Monthly Installments for the remaining balance will be charged to your account each month throughout the promotional period, payment in full for this installment must be made prior to each monthly due date. 4.8% Finance Factor. 13.9% A.P.R. (Annual Percentage Rate) is charged on the outstanding balance. Cost of Borrowing Example: On an equal payment purchase with a financed amount of $1,999.00 for 24 months, the payments are $95.42 per month. The total interest paid is $302.08 at an annual interest rate of 13.90% A.P.R. (Annual Percentage Rate). The total cost of borrowing is calculated as follows: $95.42 monthly payment X 24 months = $2,290.08 principal & interest. $2,290.08 principal & interest - $1,999.00 financed amount = $302.08, the total Cost of Borrowing. Prices and availability are subject to change without notice.
